for Representative in Congress for the unexpired term against Mr. English and in favor of Mr. Hilborn, just as they did in the matter of the election under consideration, makes it absolutely necessary in order to determine the rights of the parties by anything like reliable evidence to reject the ballots. This circumstantial evidence, complete as it is, seems to me to be more conclusive than would be the direct testimony of any witness that he saw the election officers commit the fraud charged, because the circumstances are proved by entirely satisfactory and unquestionable evidence and concur in indicating the fraud beyond reasonable question, while a witness might wilfully lie about his observation of the fact.

Mr. LACEY. Did you not run several thousand votes behind Mr. Cleveland in your district, and was not the case similar in other districts in California?

Mr. MAGUIRE. The vote for member of Congress in my district was less on both sides than for Presidential electors. That resulted from the failure of many voters to place the marks required by law opposite the names of all candidates for whom they desired to vote. Many of them marked opposite the electors and failed to mark opposite the names of any other candidates, evidently having the idea that the mark opposite the Presidential electors of either party carried the party ticket, as in many States such a mark legally does.

But I can not see how any confusion on the part of the voter in the matter of marking his ballot could possibly account for any of the suspicious circumstances relating to the returns and ballots in Altamont precinct upon which I have commented or upon which contestant relies. It does not in any way tend to explain what I conceive to be the principal fact, namely, that the election officers made false returns against Mr. English and in favor of Mr. Hilborn in both elections, giving Mr. Hilborn 14 votes to which Mr. English was entitled in the election for the long term, and 15 votes to which Mr. English was entitled in the election for the short term.

Mr. LACEY. It shows, if the gentleman will permit me, that the voters did not mark their ballots as they thought they did.

Mr. MAGUIRE. That is probably true of the illiterate voters and it may be true of others, but it does not in any way change the fact that the ballots, as produced, show that in both elections Mr. English was deprived of votes that should have been counted for him even according to the ballots, and that Mr. Hilborn was credited with votes in both cases which should not have been counted for him, and that the number of votes so miscounted in each case constituted a very large proportion of the entire vote cast in the precinct.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MAGUIRE. Certainly.

Mr. HUTCHESON. If there was a change in the returns, why did not they change the ballots so as to correspond with the returns and make the whole thing conform?

Mr. MAGUIRE. I do not know, nor would it shed any light upon this discussion to state my theory of that matter. If the election officers, or some of them, sought to accomplish a purpose by fraudulently tampering with the ballots, as well as by falsifying the returns, it is probable that difficulties may have arisen in the matter of manipulating the ballots, and that such work must, almost of necessity, have been done in a hurry. Enough of changes to accomplish the desired result would probably satisfy their desires. Fraud generally leaves a track by which it can be traced. Rarely does fraud cover all of its tracks. But this is all conjecture.

It is not necessary that we should develop theoretically a complete scheme of fraud by which the result was or might have been accomplished. It is enough that we show fraudulent acts which discredited the evidence ordinarily relied upon to justify the receipt of the ballots as evidence, and that we show other circumstances indicating a probable willingness on the part of the persons connected with the keeping of the ballots to commit fraud, and some sort of opportunity for its commission. This has been done in the case of Altamont precinct very conclusively. These things have been shown affirmatively by Mr. English, although the law requires from him only a negative showing in order to defeat the right of the contestee to use the ballots as evidence.

Mr. COX. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I understand the ballots called in question were marked ballots?

Mr. MAGUIRE. Yes, sir; marked with the initials of certain of the election officers. These initials as shown by the majority of the committee on elections in its report, were superfluous and were neither authorized nor required by law.

Mr. COX. Why were they marked if there was no law requiring it? What was the object in marking them?

Mr. MAGUIRE. I do not know upon what theory the election officers marked the ballots.

Mr. COX. Who did mark them?

Mr. MAGUIRE. That I do not know, but they purported to be marked by two of the five men whose testimony has been referred to in this discussion.

Mr. COX. I can not see their object, I must confess.

Mr. LOUD. It should be stated that the law always required the ballots to be so marked prior to this election.

Mr. REED. That is to say, the previous law required it?

Mr. LOUD. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I think that is correct. My impression is that the law prior to the adoption of the Australian ballot system required the ballots to be marked. That has been for many years the rule established by the laws governing elections in San Francisco, and I think it was general prior to 1892. I have had no occasion to examine that question particularly.

Mr. REED. Will the gentleman from California allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MAGUIRE. Certainly.

Mr. REED. If the ballots were tampered with, how can the gentleman account for the fact that they were not made to correspond with the returns? Why should there, in other words, be two tamperings to produce this result?

Mr. BROWN. But the "Democrats can't read" you know.

Mr. REED. The gentleman suggests that the Democrats can not read.

Mr. MAGUIRE. The gentleman from Maine asks me to explain why the ballots were not made to correspond with the returns, if they were in fact tampered with after the election. In effect he asks me why it was that men preparing a fraud did not proceed to do it in a particular way. I am not able to give the gentleman any information on that point. It may be that their opportunities for making their fraudulent acts correspond with each other were limited, or it may be that they did not have time to complete the job.

Mr. REED. Do you not think, in view of that fact and the other evidence in the case, that there was no fraud? Is it not an indication that there was no fraud, that this act was done in such a way as that?

Mr. MAGUIRE. I do not think that the failure to make the ballots correspond with the returns is any evidence that there was no fraud committed.

Mr. REED. And the gentleman insists that there was fraud?

Mr. MAGUIRE. Nothing could convince me that the men who made false returns against Mr. English and in favor of Mr. Hilborn in the two elections, could have made those false returns through any honest mistake. The falsity of the returns in the matter of both elections is the controlling circumstance, to my mind, indicating fraud, and satisfying me that a willful wrong was committed by at least some of the election officers of that precinct against Mr. English and in favor of Mr. Hilborn. It is that circumstance more than all the rest of the evidence that convinces me that the ballots, the integrity of which depends so entirely upon the testimony of those election officers, ought not to be received as evidence superior to the testimony of the voters. It is quite unnecessary now to discuss the uniform rule of this House so mercilessly followed in the contested-election cases of the Fifty-first Congress, namely, that whenever the election returns and the ballots are discredited, this House will resort to the testimony of the voters for the purpose of determining the election of a Representative.

The majority report of the Committee on Elections cites a number of these cases, notably Featherston vs. Cate, affirming the case of Bisbee vs. Finley; also the case of McGinnis vs. Alderson and Clayton vs. Breckinridge.

In the case of McGinnis vs. Alderson (Contested Election Cases of the Fifty-first Congress, page 635) the report of the Republican majority of the Committee on Elections, relating to the rejection of ballots and a resort to parol evidence, says:

> The recount in Kanawha County showed a change of 9 votes in Alum Creek precinct and 25 votes in Charleston precinct.
> In the West Virginia election cases in the present Congress and in the famous case in the gubernatorial contest between Fleming and Goff we have had striking illustrations of the dangers of a recount of the ballots where a change of a few tickets may affect the result. The law of West Virginia, whilst it provides for such recount, attempts to throw around the recount such elements of safety as will prevent a fraudulent change of the ballots. Such recount is always viewed with suspicion, and is full of danger.

This report was submitted to the Fifty-first Congress by the distinguished gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

In the case of Bisbee vs. Finley, Sixth Congressional Election Cases, page 62, it was held—

> Where the evidence shows a return to be false, and not a true statement of the votes cast, such return is impeached and destroyed as evidence, and the true vote may be proven by calling the electors whose names are on the poll books as voting at such poll and no votes not otherwise proven should be counted.

In McCrary on Elections, section 539, the rule is stated as follows:

If an officer of the election is detected in a willful and deliberate fraud upon the ballot box, the better opinion is that this will destroy the integrity of his official acts even though the fraud discovered is not of itself sufficient to affect the result.

In Paine on Elections, section 596, it is said:

When the proceedings are so tarnished by fraudulent, negligent, or improper conduct on the part of the officers that the result of the election is rendered unreliable, the entire returns will be rejected and the parties left to make such proof as they may of the votes legally cast for them.

In McDuffie vs. Turpin (Fifty-first Congress, 299) it was held—

If these officers would falsify the returns, it follows that no reliance could be placed in the contents of the ballot boxes left in their hands after the election.

The case of McDuffie vs. Turpin, which certainly ought to be recognized as the highest possible authority by the gentlemen on the Republican side of this House, seems to be pretty conclusive of the present case. We submit that a vindication of the purity of the ballot and of the sacredness of the elective franchise requires that the ballots, as well as the returns, from Altamont precinct should be rejected, and that the testimony of the legally qualified voters of that precinct who voted at the election in question should be received and accepted as the best evidence, under the circumstances, of the votes cast by them at that election. Upon that evidence the contestant, Mr. English, has a plurality of 26 votes and is entitled to the seat now occupied by the contestee.

Mr. WAUGH. I yield five minutes now to the gentleman from California [Mr. BOWERS].

Mr. BOWERS of California. Mr. Speaker, I desire first to allude to a remark which my colleague from California [Mr. MAGUIRE] made, that there were two elections held. There was but one election that day, and there was but one ballot for all the offices. That ballot read, "For Congress, long term, Samuel G. Hilborn." Immediately under it, "For Congress, short term, Samuel G. Hilborn." And Mr. English's name was the same. There was but one election and one ballot.

Mr. NORTHWAY. And one piece of paper went into the ballot box for the whole. It was all on one ballot?

Mr. BOWERS of California. Yes.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I as a Republican apprehend as well as any Democrat can the necessity which exists for the Democratic party to add to its present majority a sufficient number to enable it do business. It is a laudable desire. But, sir, I want to caution my Democratic friends that while the people of this country are quick to condone a mistake of judgment, they will resent a deliberate wrong and sin against one of their dearest rights, the elective franchise. The history of this country makes this fact plain, that sooner or later every person who subverts an honest election comes to grief; and to do a great wrong for a temporary advantage, never pays in the end.

The alternative presented in this case is, Shall the ballot, as freely cast by the voter on the day of election, or shall affidavits made weeks or months after the election, govern as evidence of the election of a Representative in Congress? This is all there is of this case.

The ballots cast at the election in question, not one of which, I want you to remember, has been impeached, elected Mr. Hilbron, the sitting member, and he was sworn in as a member of this House. If some affidavits, procured some time after the election, by the contestant, are to be held as setting aside the ballots, and to be the better evidence, then the sitting member must give way, for he has no affidavits. He was under the impression that the majority of legal ballots cast at the election was to decide.

In this case the contestant procured, in the precinct of Altamont, the affidavits of thirty-seven persons, resident therein, that they voted for the contestant; whereas the ballots themselves testified that but 29 votes were cast in that precinct for the contestant. Which of these are best entitled to credence?

Gentlemen of the other side, are you ready to adopt this precedent, this practice that affidavits shall govern and not ballots determine the elections of members of Congress?

Have you stopped and considered for a moment where this will lead, and the momentous consequences that may ensue?

Mr. STOCKDALE. How does the gentleman account for this mistake?

Mr. BOWERS of California. I have only five minutes. I have not interrupted anybody and I can not allow myself to be interrupted.

Let me suggest a possible case. It is charged that in many of the Congressional districts many voters are allowed to vote, but that their votes are not counted to any great extent. Now, my friends, it must be apparent to you that the signs all portend that the majority will soon; very soon, swing to this side. You believe it. You come very near knowing it. And in view of this fact that stares you in the face every day, are you quite ready to establish this practice of counting affidavits instead of votes? If the majority that is soon to take your place follow this practice, which it seems you have determined on, they could, by affidavits that would be true, unseat half the delegation from several States, and you could not elect a baker's dozen of members from States that now have 50 members. And if that majority see fit to adopt the practice now to be inaugurated by you, are you not estopped from complaining by your own acts? What think you of the facility with which such affidavits by the thousands can be procured in several States, affidavits that will be true.

If you gentlemen desire to establish this practice, I think this side can well afford to lose one member now by your act, which will give us a gain of fifty members in the next Congress by doing as you do now.

Will you say to the voters of the United States that their rights in respect to electing Congressmen are wholly at the mercy of and subordinate to any ignorant, malicious, or rascally judge, inspector, or clerk of election, and from such malicious rascality, or from any unintentional mistake of theirs, no appeal will be entertained by this House? This is the question to be decided by the vote on this case: Shall affidavits or legal ballots determine?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There are ten minutes remaining on each side.

Mr. WAUGH. I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen who have spoken, or who may speak on this case, have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. MAGUIRE. It is understood that that request applies to both sides?

Mr. WAUGH. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked that all gentlemen who have spoken or who speak upon this subject have leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WAUGH. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD].

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, in ten minutes it is hardly possible to argue this election case, and I am therefore compelled to confine myself to just one point in the case. Before coming to that point, however, I desire to answer one or two suggestions made by my colleague from California [Mr. MAGUIRE]. He first stated that the returns from the Altamont precinct had been mysteriously withheld. Now the facts in the case are that the returns from the Altamont precinct were received at half past 4 on the next day, and that those returns were among the first country precinct returns that were received. The gentleman, swelling with assumed patriotic pride, seemed to give a reason to this House why an object existed for counting Mr. Hilborn in, and proceeded to say that there were millions behind this gentleman, behind the policy that he would enunciate if he came to Congress. The gentleman forgets that when this precinct came into controversy, there was not a man, woman, or child in the United States who did not well know that this House was overwhelmingly Democratic and that Mr. Hilborn's presence here would have no effect to change any condition that existed. So much for that.

Now then, the question was asked the gentleman about the mysterious method or manner of marking these ballots. My friend from Tennessee asked the question why these ballots were marked. I will tell the gentleman. The law in California for twenty years has required the officers to mark the ballots. It was changed in so much of California as lay outside of San Francisco by the last election law, so we can easily dispose of that question as to why the ballots were marked. But look for a moment. You proposed to unseat, and did unseat, Mr. Joy, because, under the law, the ballots were not marked, and it is here an important factor in this case, because the ballots were marked.

You have proceeded in this case to impeach the testimony, the reliability, and the truthfulness of six of the election officers of this precinct who are Democrats; five of whom in the testimony given in their affidavits swear that they voted for Mr. English. Now, you hold that in their returns, as officials, they rendered false returns, that they laid themselves liable to be sent to the penitentiary of the State of California, but when it comes to taking their affidavits, then, of course, their testimony must be believed.

Let me present to this House one feature that the members of the committee have never taken into consideration. This was the first time that we had ever voted under the Australian ballot system. It was a new system, it was a confusing system to us. The gentleman from California well knows that, and I would not make oath to-day, sir, as to who I voted for on the ticket I cast in the last election. They had but one ticket, containing the names of 480 candidates for office, and you were obliged to go into an obscure, dark stall in a booth and select about 80 names on that ticket.

Mr. MAGUIRE. But there were not 480 candidates for office in Alameda County.

Mr. LOUD. There were not that many candidates in Alameda County, but there were 60 or 80 names on their tickets, and it was quite a lengthy ticket.

Now then, there was a falling off in the Congressional vote in the whole of the State of California, permeating every district and every precinct. There was a falling off of nearly 30,000 votes—a falling off of 10 per cent as compared with the Presidential vote. The falling off in that district was nearly 4,000—more than 10 per cent, nearly 17 per cent; and you will find that that same falling off went throughout the districts.

Mr. PENCE. That many less for Congressmen than for the President?

Mr. LOUD. Yes; that many less for Congressmen than for President. Now, what have you done under this peculiar system of affidavits that you have here adopted?

Mr. MAGUIRE. You mean depositions?

Mr. LOUD. Well, then, depositions; I do not care what you call them. You have been compelled to give Mr. English, the contestee, one more vote than Mr. Cleveland received. Now, is that a possible contingency, when you know that there has been a falling off in every precinct of more than 10 per cent on the Congressional vote?

Mr. GROUT. Highly improbable, to say the least.

Mr. LOUD. Now, you have taken one vote from the People's party candidate, whereas the result shows all through the State of California that the People's party candidate for Congress ran ahead of their candidate for President, and on the Republican and Democratic sides they fell behind by from 10 to 17 per cent. That may appear strange to you, but I can explain it. The names of the Republican and Democratic candidates for Congress came at the bottom of the column in which were contained the names of the Presidential electors. There was a group of four tickets, and at the bottom there was just room for the names of the Republican and Democratic candidates for Congress. Turning to the top of the next column, you came to the Populist, or People's party candidate for Congress. It was very naturally assumed by parties who cast these ballots, as this was the first election held under this system, that when they put their cross opposite their group of electors they had completed that column.

I believe that is the reason why the vote fell off so far below the vote for President. Now, I do not believe, and there are reasons why no reasonable person can be made to believe that the Democratic candidate for Congressman in that precinct received over 30 votes. This whole case hinges upon this one point. Five Democratic officers of election, whose whole conduct had been discredited up to this moment, until the moment when they were brought forward to give their depositions or affidavits as to how they voted, and then we are called upon to place reliance and confidence in their testimony there, and to discredit every action on their part that had taken place before that.

Mr. HULICK. Has the reputation of any of these officers ever been questioned in the community in which they live?

Mr. LOUD. No gentleman from California upon this floor will dare to do that. These are gentlemen above reproach, honest farmers. That is not the kind of place where you find crooked politics. My colleague from San Francisco knows that very well.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Do you refer to the voters?

Mr. LOUD. I refer to the voters of that precinct, who are honest farmers of the State of California.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Yes; that is true.

Mr. KYLE. How long is a voter allowed to remain in the booth?

Mr. LOUD. Ten minutes. This new system of voting was most confusing to the voters. I never was more confused in my life.

Mr. MAGUIRE. How does my colleague account for the difference against English and in favor of Hilborn in both the election contests?

Mr. LOUD. I do not know that I understand the point the gentleman desires to make. Will he please repeat the question?

Mr. MAGUIRE. English was credited with 14 votes less than he was entitled to, and——

Mr. LOUD. Oh, I do not believe that the returns were correct at all.

Mr. MAGUIRE. But how do you account for the discrepancy in both the elections?

Mr. LOUD. They were on the same ticket. They succeeded one another.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired. There are ten minutes remaining on the other side.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. Speaker, if I can get the attention of the House I will try and call the minds of gentlemen back to the point in question. The returns of Altamont precinct gave a plurality of 22 votes for the contestee. The recount gave a plurality of 14 for the contestant. The recount of the ballots elected the contestee by 4 votes. He concedes that the returns are unreliable and can not be trusted for any purpose, but he maintains, or seeks to maintain, that the ballots are the best evidence and that they must control and overthrow all other evidence in the case. Now, I concede that if there were no question before the House but that the ballots recounted were the ballots cast and were in precisely the same condition when they were recounted that they were in when voted, his point would be well taken. But the burden of proof is on him to show this fact.

The burden of proof is on him and he has utterly failed to show the fact, because the exhibit made as to how these ballots were kept clearly shows that they were liable to be tampered with.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Are not the ballots themselves prima facie evidence, and is not the burden of proof upon the other side?

Mr. BROWN. Not at all; unless it is first shown that they have been safely and securely kept. The case put by my friend from Maine does not exist "way down in Maine."

Mr. MILLIKEN. Well, the gentleman will find it so if he comes down to Maine, and he will get some good instruction on the subject of voting, too. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROWN. Now, I will ask my friend to allow me to go on, for we want to get away from here as soon as we can. But, Mr. Speaker, aside from that question, if these ballots are to be relied upon by the contestee, the onus probandi is upon him to show that the ballots recounted were the identical ones that were cast. The integrity of these ballots is called in question. Nobody disputes that. This record shows that there were from 12 to 14 illiterates who voted at that precinct; why has not the contestee produced his Republican clerk, Mr. Udy, and proved by him that those illiterates were not defrauded and their votes stolen by the whelps who made out the ballots for them? If you will take the votes of those illiterates and count them for the Democratic ticket it just about makes out the case according to contestant's contention.

Mr. WAUGH. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion at this point, so that the whole facts may be before the House?

Mr. BROWN. I can not yield.

Mr. WAUGH. Well, I will ask the gentleman who prepared the ballots for the illiterate voters? I say every one of them was prepared by a Democrat, by a man who voted for English.

Mr. BROWN. If I were to set out to perpetrate a fraud and forgery on the ballot box by which I am to be benefited I would hire Republicans to do it, and not Democrats; because the Republicans would have the power to aid me, while the Democrats would not. So it was out there. If these Democrats—for whom I have no respect if they were guilty of this thing, if they committed this wrong—had the power to aid the contestee it shows the shrewdness of the Republican managers in perpetrating this election fraud by employing these men instead of their own political kith and kin.

I call attention to the fact that while this contest was going on, the testimony of thirty-seven voters of Altamont precinct was taken. Every one of them was subject to cross-examination by a most adroit and skillful lawyer. If they were not honest men, if they did not speak the truth, if their testimony is not to be relied on, why has not the contestee, whose residence is in the same county with these voters, cast suspicion on them? May I not say that they were unimpeached and unimpeachable?

One thing more and I am done. There seems to be confusion in the minds of some members as to what the result of this election would be if we exclude the election board, whose members testify that they voted for the contestant.

As I said before, if, in considering the testimony of the voters of Altamont precinct, you assume that the 23 voters in that precinct who were not sworn voted for the contestee, then contestant's plurality is but 3; and if you then exclude the members of the election board of course his plurality would be overcome. But no gentleman has disputed or will dispute that when you depart from the returns and also from the ballots, and the parties are obliged to prove their votes aside from the returns and aside from the ballots, each man is credited with the votes he proves. Mr. Hilborn proved none; therefore, the contestant's plurality is 26. But you may take these Democrats of this election board and hug them to your bosoms dear and throw their votes out of the count, and the contestant is elected by 19 plurality.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed for debate has expired. The previous question is now ordered. The Clerk will report the resolutions submitted as a substitute by the minority of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Samuel G. Hilborn was legally elected to a seat in the Fifty-third Congress from the Third Congressional district of California, and entitled to retain his seat in this House.

Resolved, That Warren B. English was not legally elected to a seat in the Fifty-third Congress from the Third Congressional district of California, and is not entitled to a seat in this House.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon adopting, as a substitute for the resolutions of the majority of the Committee on Elections the resolutions just read.

Mr. BURROWS. I call for a division, so that the two resolutions embraced in this substitute may be voted on separately.

The SPEAKER. A division being called for, the question is now upon the first of the resolutions just read.

The question having been put——

The SPEAKER. The noes seem to have it.

Mr. WAUGH. Division.

Mr. BROWN. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 85, nays 155, not voting 112; as follows:

PETITION OF PHILADELPHIA BOARD OF TRADE.

Mr. QUAY. I present a petition of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the imposition of adequate duties on sugar. As Philadelphia has some $30,000,000 invested in this industry, and as the petition is very brief, I should be glad to have it read and printed in the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the petition will be read.

Mr. HARRIS. What is the request?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks for the reading of a petition.

Mr. QUAY. It is a petition of the Board of Trade of the city of Philadelphia relative to the imposition of additional duties upon sugar, refined and raw.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator wants it printed as a document I have no objection, but I object to its being read at the desk or printed in the RECORD.

Mr. QUAY. I desire, if the Secretary will return it to me, to explain the petition, which I will do by reading it.

Mr. PLATT and Mr. CULLOM (to Mr. QUAY). You will not be allowed to do that.

Mr. QUAY. I have a right to explain the contents of the petition. It is a petition of the Board of Trade of the city of Philadelphia, an association of gentlemen of the very highest respectability, engaged in mercantile and other business in that city. It reads thus:

PHILADELPHIA BOARD OF TRADE,
Drexel Building, Philadelphia, March 31, 1894.

The Philadelphia Board of Trade, through its committee on domestic productions, respectfully asks the attention of the Senators and Representatives of Pennsylvania to the fact——

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania will suspend until the question of order is disposed of.

Mr. HARRIS. The rule requires that a brief statement of a petition or memorial shall be made to the Senate. It can not be read at length, neither by the Senator presenting it nor by the Secretary; nor can it be printed in the RECORD without unanimous consent. If it is yielded to in one instance, I should not feel warranted in objecting to every memorial being read and the RECORD being encumbered by all the petitions and memorials that come to us.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask for the reading of the rule to which the Senator from Tennessee refers.

Mr. ALDRICH. The rule is undoubtedly exactly as stated by the Senator from Tennessee, but I suggest to the Senator from Pennsylvania that immediately after the routine morning business is concluded he can make some remarks on anything which happens to be before the Senate, and read the petition as part of his remarks.

Mr. HARRIS. That is an ingenious method of evading and violating the rule, but I think the Senator from Rhode Island is right. That course may be resorted to if any Senator chooses to do it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the rule be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will have the rule read.

The Secretary read the fourth paragraph of Rule VII, as follows:

Every petition or memorial shall be signed by the petitioner or memorialist and have indorsed thereon a brief statement of its contents, and shall be presented and referred without debate. But no petition or memorial, or other paper, signed by citizens or subjects of a foreign power shall be received, unless the same be transmitted to the Senate by the President.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Chair and the Senator from Tennessee will allow me, I do not see that the rule states that petitions shall not be read. It simply says that a petition shall be presented and referred without debate. The Senator from Pennsylvania has attempted no debate. The rule does not say that a petition shall not be read. It says that a petition shall have indorsed upon it a brief statement of its contents, and so far as we know that is the case with this petition. I should like to have the Senator from Tennessee point out where the rule is which he announces with such gravity——

Mr. HARRIS. The rule that has just been read.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will wait a moment, I ask him to point out anything in the rule which has just been read which says that if a petition is properly signed and briefly indorsed the Senator presenting it shall not read it. I do not see it in the rule.

Mr. HARRIS. There is no express prohibition, I grant, but the rule prescribes the method of dealing with a petition, which is by a brief statement, and not by reading it either at the clerk's desk or by the Senator presenting it.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Chair allow me one word further?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. The rule being complied with, that there shall be a brief statement upon the petition of its contents, which it is to be presumed was done in this case, the Senator from Pennsylvania is not prohibited by any rule whatever from reading the petition. He is prohibited from debating it after it has been read. While I am willing to take the commentary of the Senator from Tennessee under ordinary circumstances the same as a rule itself, I am not willing to do so in this case. I submit that under the rule, so far as the language of the rule goes every Senator has a right to read a petition in full if it has the proper indorsement.

Mr. QUAY. I ask for a decision of the question raised as to my right to read the petition, it being properly indorsed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the views of Senators on the question.

Mr. PLATT. May I be permitted a word?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will be very glad to hear the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT. I see no order in the rule that a petition shall not be read, nor do I suppose that a single objection can prevent the reading of a petition. If an objection is made, it seems to me it is a question for the Senate to determine whether the petition shall be read.

Mr. VEST. It is never a very pleasant thing to object to the request of a Senator that a petition from his constituency may be read. It has been my duty on one or two occasions—one, I distinctly remember, to object because a Senator saw proper to enter into an argument as to a pending issue before the Senate under the guise of presenting a petition. I take it for granted that the meaning of the rule is very distinct. It is in the interest of saving time and to prevent an abuse that could be easily inflicted by any Senator upon this body.

The rule requires that a petition shall be accompanied by a brief statement of the nature of the petition. Anyone can appreciate very easily how an abuse of the rule would absorb all the time and attention of this body. Petitions have been brought here which would fill a wheelbarrow.

Is it possible that a Senator could stand here and read or require the officers of the body to read such petitions with all the signatures, and take up one week's time of the body? Is that the meaning of the rule? What did the framers of it mean when they said a brief statement of the contents should be indorsed upon every petition or memorial? It was based upon the idea of the sacred right of petition, as our fathers termed it; not that this abuse should be inflicted upon the Senate; not that the Senator should make it a vehicle for a speech on presenting a petition from his constituency, but that any citizen of the United States, or any number of citizens, could come here and petition this body for legislation and their representatives could in a brief statement bring the matter before the attention of the Senate.

Now, the rule ought to be observed or it ought to be abrogated. If one Senator can do this, as a matter of course every member of the body can avail himself of the same privilege. The Senator from Pennsylvania presents a petition. I do not know what it is, but coming from that locality I take it that it is an attack upon the pending tariff bill. I could present to-morrow and have read a petition from my constituency in favor of the bill, or as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] says, 40 or 100 petitions; and so we would indulge in this game of shuttlecock from one side of the Chamber to the other under the pretense of presenting petitions for legislation from our constituents.

Mr. ALDRICH. There are some circumstances at the present time surrounding this class of petitions which, while it does not take them out of the strict letter of the rule, certainly should lead the Presiding Officer and the Senate to construe the rule in its spirit very liberally. The majority of the Senate Finance Committee have selected certain interests of their own to be heard upon the tariff question, and have by their action precluded any possibility of any other class of people being heard, either before the committee or before the Senate. Under these circumstances to deny the right of the reading of the petitions in the Senate is to deny the right of petition. I hope that the Senate—a majority of the Senate at least—will be extremely liberal in their construction of the rule.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Mr. President, I am very glad to see the Senator from Rhode Island exercising that candor for which he is justly proverbial, when he admits that under the rule the Senator from Pennsylvania has no right to demand the reading of the petition. As a member of the Committee on Rules, I expected nothing less from the Senator from Rhode Island. He is too good a parliamentarian and too expert in the interpretation of plain Anglo-Saxon not to know, and too honest not to admit, that under the rule a Senator has no right to demand the reading of a petition.

I would warn the Senate of the dilemma into which it might be betrayed, amounting to an absurdity. I could now send to the clerk's desk, upon the call for petitions and memorials under the order of morning business, enough petitions and memorials upon the subject of the pending tariff bill to keep the Senate here listening to the clerk's reading them for the next four days. If it were the purpose of anybody here to resort to dilatory tactics, or what is denominated filibustering maneuvers, this would be the most efficacious method that could possibly be suggested; for I doubt not that I am inside of the mark when I say that if all the petitions pro and con upon the pending tariff bill were read in extenso from the desk the ides of June would be here before the Senate would ever have one hour or one minute to devote to any other business.

It can not be denied that the rule does not say in express terms that a petition shall not be read at the clerk's desk. There is no necessity for any inhibition of the sort. The rule does provide what shall be done with a petition when presented, and the limitation ends with the privilege granted by the express terms of the rule, and that is, as stated by the Senator from Tennessee and the Senator from Missouri, that it shall be accompanied by a brief statement, simply indicating to the Senate the purpose and drift of the petition. Then it is referred to the committee that appropriately has charge of the measure to which it relates, and there it receives its proper consideration. But the Senator from Rhode Island admits, what I take it every parliamentarian will have to admit, that under the rule as it stands to-day it is not the right of the Senator from Pennsylvania to demand the reading of the petition.

Mr. MANDERSON. Mr. President, I have no question in my mind at all but that the rule which has been read in the hearing of the Senate prohibits the reading at length, either by a Senator or at the desk, of any petition that may be presented to the body. By inference that is prohibited, and the Senator presenting a petition is confined to the making of a brief statement of its contents. Of course, what is a brief statement of the contents of a petition must be left very largely to the discretion of the Senator who presents it. I know of no method by which he can be curtailed even if in the opinion of Senators or of the Senate or of the Presiding Officer his statement should be verbose rather than brief. I have no question but that the rule is that he shall confine himself to a brief statement, and a desire to conform to the rule would prevent any violation of the rule by indirection.

But when a paper of this kind is presented to the body as this has been, and handed to the clerks, it is a paper the reading of which I think can be called for by any member, and if objection is made to the reading of the paper, then it can be decided by a vote of the Senate. The President of the Senate now in the Chair will undoubtedly remember a discussion over this very matter during the extra session, in which the question as to what another rule might mean came up. That the papers when objected to might be read by a vote of the majority of the Senate is the substance of the rule. Now, what are the papers that may be read in this fashion? Not a newspaper article. That can only be read by the Senator himself, making it a part of his remarks. Not an extract from a book. That is not a paper within the meaning of the rule to which I advert. The paper must be something that is incident to the business of the body, or it must be something of a public nature—an act of Congress—some paper that is official from one of the Departments, or a paper incident to the business of the body; and that I take this to be. I think it then comes under the rule laid down very closely by Cushing: > which in fact make a part of the question before the House, there are other documents of a public nature, accessible to everybody, as acts of Parliament, journals of the House, proclamations and papers, private or official, received or ordered by the House, etc., which members desire to have read for the information of the House, either with reference to some question then pending, or for the purpose of laying a foundation for further proceedings; and, in all such cases, as well as in reference to papers, involved in a pending question, which have already been once read, the reading must be on motion and vote.

> Besides papers of the description above referred to—

That is to say, bills and resolutions that are up for a vote of the body—

It seems to me that this petition, being presented to the body by the Senator from Pennsylvania and handed to the Secretary, is one of the papers the reading of which can not be had when objected to except by a majority vote of the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I do not quite agree with my friend from Nebraska. Rule VII prescribes the exact method of dealing with a petition or memorial. Another rule refers to the reading of papers, evidently papers other than petitions and memorials. I do not know what the memorial which the Senator from Pennsylvania has proposed to read is. So far as the Senator read it, he read it in so low a tone that I could not hear a word of what he said. But my object and purpose were to maintain and enforce the rule, and not to encumber the RECORD with that or any other petition or memorial in violation of what I conceive to be the proper construction of the rule. I want to state, and I do so with absolute distinctness and certainty, that during the seventeen years which I have been here I have never heard the construction of this rule questioned until to-day. One objection to the reading of a memorial or petition has been invariably recognized as fatal to the proposition to read it or print it in the RECORD; until this hour I have never heard that construction of the rule questioned by anybody upon this floor; and I think I can state with absolute confidence that it has been the uniform ruling of the Chair that an objection to the reading of such a paper is fatal.

Mr. MANDERSON. Before the Senator takes his seat I wish he would address himself to a further proposition. I think he is perfectly right as to the construction of the rule that, if objected to, it being a paper filed with the Senate pertaining to a question involving legislation and part of the files, as it becomes when it is handed to the Secretary, such paper can not be read if objected to, but is it not subject to be read under the other rule by a vote of a majority of the Senate?

Mr. HARRIS. I think not in the case of a petition or memorial, for the reason that the rule specifically prescribes the method of dealing with such a paper. Then, another rule prescribes what shall be done when papers other than petitions are sought to be read. I think one rule applies to petitions and memorials and the other rule applies to papers other than petitions and memorials.

Mr. PLATT. I can not believe that the Senate by any rule it may have adopted has intended to cut itself off or has cut itself off from the reading of any petition which it may desire to have read in this body. That it has passed a rule, the general effect of which is to have petitions presented without reading, is undoubtedly true, because the business of the Senate could not stop for the reading of all petitions; but the Senate has left to itself the power to discriminate as to what petitions it will have read, and it has always discriminated in that it has universally had read memorials and resolutions of the Legislature of a State.

Mr. HARRIS. That is under the rule.

Mr. PLATT. There is no rule which requires the reading of memorials of a State Legislature or resolutions passed by a Legislature any more than the memorial or resolution of a board of trade in Philadelphia; and if this rule cuts off the reading of a petition, it cuts off the the reading of the memorial of a State Legislature. If it has the construction to prevent the Senate from having the resolution of a board of trade read, it has the construction of preventing the Senate from having the memorial of the Legislature of a State read upon a single objection. These two documents stand in no different position with regard to the rule.

This rule has not been invariably observed, for I remember that within three days the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of the city of Portland, if I am not mistaken, and asked to have them read; and they were read without objection. The resolutions of a board of trade or chamber of commerce in an important city or of a large number of people in a State stand upon somewhat different grounds than the petition of a single individual. Nobody has any desire to have every petition of every individual read here, and the Senate would not permit it; but there is nothing in this rule which prohibits it any more than there is which prohibits the reading of a memorial of a Legislature.

What I claim is, that when objection is raised, the Senate must certainly be held to have reserved to itself the right, if it chooses, to have the petition read. Otherwise we should scarcely have any right of petition here; otherwise we might have the motion to prevail at once to throw all petitions in the waste basket, and never have them referred to committees. I do not think the Senate has intended to deal with the right of petition in this way. I do think that it has intended not to allow its record to be encumbered by all petitions and every petition which may be presented here; but I think it must have reserved to itself the right to have a petition read, if it so desires, and I do not see why, under this rule, it is not expressely provided that the Senate can determine that this petition or any petition to which objection is made shall be read.

RULE XI.

OBJECTION TO READING A PAPER.

When the reading of a paper is called for and objected to, it shall be determined by a vote of the Senate, without debate.

When this petition has been presented by the Senator from Pennsylvania, is it not an official paper of the Senate? There is nothing in the rule which refers to the memorial of a Legislature which requires it to be read. That rule refers to the printing of papers, and is as follows:

RULE XXIX.

PRINTING OF PAPERS, ETC.

1. Every motion to print documents, reports, and other matter transmitted by either of the Executive Departments, or to print memorials, petitions, accompanying documents, or any other paper, except bills of the Senate or House of Representatives, resolutions submitted by a Senator, communications from the Legislatures or conventions, lawfully called, of the respective States, and motions to print by order of the standing or select committees of the Senate, shall, unless the Senate otherwise order, be referred to the Committee on Printing.

All that rule says is that when a motion is made to print the memorial of a State Legislature the question of printing need not to be referred to the Committee on Printing. We have invariably read, notwitanding this rule, the memorials of Legislatures of States, because, I suppose, it was taken for granted that a majority of the Senate thought in all such instances it was proper that such memorials and resolutions should be read. I can not conceive that any rule has been passed here by which the Senate has deprived itself of the power of having read a resolution, a memorial, or a petition when it thinks that that resolution or memorial or petition is of sufficient importance to have it read.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, we are now proceeding under Rule VII, in the regular order of business as laid down by that rule and that is "the presentation of petitions and memorials." We have not reached that order of business when it becomes a part of the consideration to have a paper read; we are only in that part of the morning business for "the presentation of petitions and memorials." What can be done in this order of proceeding? Nothing, but receive petitions and memorials under the rule prescribed for the reception and disposition of petitions and memorials. The part of the rule which refers to the reading of a paper is therefore not intended to apply to the reception of petitions and memorials, because no paper can be offered to be read during this order of business set apart for the reception of petitions and memorials.

The reading of papers, when objected to or not objected to, arises in a different order of business as laid down by the rules, and petitions can not be presented in that part of the order of business prescribed by the rules providing for the reading of a paper. Therefore, that part of the rule which provides that a paper may be read, and, if objected to, read by order of the Senate, does not apply to petitions at all. When the Senate by its rules provides how petitions shall be received and disposed of, it follows under the universal rule of construction of all laws, parliamentary, constitutional, and statutory, that the expression of one thing excludes every other thing.

A petition can not be presented in this body except in the manner pointed out by the laws of the body. It is not a sound argument to say that the rules do not prohibit a petition being read. A petition can not get into the body except in the manner prescribed by its own rule. When it gets here, it is subject to the rules prescribed—that is, it must be referred in obedience to the manner prescribed. It must be received, a brief explanation of the Senator offering it be had, and then it must be appropriately referred.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I regret that my brief inquiry should have occasioned such a lengthy debate or made such a learned discussion necessary.

It may be that the practice has grown up under this rule of prohibiting Senators from reading petitions, but certainly it is a construction of the rule, and nothing in the language of the rule itself. The rule itself has one affirmative proposition and one negative proposition. The negative proposition is that the petition shall be presented without debate. That means nothing in addition to what is contained in the petition; it means nothing else, and it excludes nothing else.

The affirmative proposition of the rule is that the petition shall have a brief statement of its contents indorsed thereon. That is clearly for the convenience of the clerks of this body, in order that there may be, so to speak, a brief title to the petition contained on the petition, which is the only descrptiion of the petition which is to go into the RECORD.

Mr. President, that is all there is to the rule—an affirmative statement that there shall be an indorsement upon the petition, and a negative statement that there shall not be debate in connection with its presentation. But I say now, as I said when I interrupted the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], that there is nothing in the rule itself which provides that a petition shall not be read upon presentation.

I repeat what I said in the beginning. It may be that such a custom has grown up under the rule, but it is not in the rule itself; it is something which has grown out of the enforcement of the rule.

I was induced to rise, Mr. President, only because the Senator from Tennessee, as I understood, in that oracular way of his, which becomes him so much and which pleases and gratifies us all, announced that the rule forbade the reading of a petition. I did not understand that it forbade the reading of a petition then, and I do not understand that it forbids the reading of a petition now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The decision of this question de-ponds upon the construction given to the fourth clause of the Rule VII, which provides:

4. Every petition or memorial shall be signed by the petitioner or memorialist and have indorsed thereon a brief statement of its contents, and shall be presented and referred without debate.

This rule of the Senate was evidently enacted in the interest of economizing the time of the Senate. The Chair in construing the rule is compelled to sustain the point of order made by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. QUAY. Is it the decision of the Chair that I am permitted to make a brief statement of the contents of the memorial?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the custom has been for a Senator presenting a petition or memorial to make a brief statement of its contents if he desires to do so.

Mr. QUAY. Waiving all question, then, Mr. President, of the right of petition and bowing without appeal to the decision of the Chair, I will mention briefly that this is a petition from the Philadelphia Board of Trade, one of the strongest commercial organizations in the country, composed of gentlemen of high intelligence, large wealth, and great respectability. It relates to the duties upon sugar. It sets forth the ideas of these gentlemen that under the proposed tariff of $1.38½ per 100 pounds all sugar above 95 degrees polariscope test, or above No. 16 Dutch standard, can be imported, and that this, in their judgment, would stimulate this importation of loaf and granulated sugars in large quantities.

The petitioners mention also the fact that under the tariff of 1890 granulated sugar to-day is being supplied to the citizens of the United States at 4¼ cents per pound, a price below that of any other country in the world, with the possible exception of England, which may be slightly lower. They say further that the capital, as I have already stated——

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania allow me to ask him if he thinks the reading of that memorial, after the ruling of the Chair, is the "brief statement" required by the rules? I simply want the Senator to decide that question for himself.

Mr. QUAY. It is a very brief statement that I am about to make, as the Senator from Tennessee will bear me witness when I have concluded; and I beg to say that I am not literally reading the memorial which I hold in my hand.

Mr. HARRIS. I supposed the Senator was reading it.

Mr. QUAY. No, sir.

As I have already stated when presenting the petition, the capital invested in the refining of sugar in the city of Philadelphia is in excess of $ 0,000,000, and by means of the industry employment is given to 6,000 workmen, with families averaging five or six persons apiece depending upon them for support. Therefore there are some 30,000 people dependent upon the industry in that city, whose interests are represented to some extent by these gentlemen in the presentation of this memorial.

In view of that fact, the committee of the board of trade say that they are of the opinion that the duty chargeable on all sugar above 95 degrees polariscope test, or No. 16 Dutch standard, should not be less than 1.26 cents, and one-quarter of a cent per pound in addition, or say, $1.51 per hundred pounds.

They mention that in their judgment any less duty than this will destroy the business of refining sugar at the port of Philadelphia, where, as I say, there are $30,000,000 capital invested, and through which port 500,000 tons of sugar pass annually.

If the destruction of American refineries is accomplished, there will be sudden advances in the price of loaf and granulated sugar to a very large extent. The petitioners suggest also that whereas other countries are now paying an export bounty on sugar and are actively exerting themselves in this body and elsewhere to secure the American markets, any bill passed by this Congress should contain a clause providing that the additional bounty paid by any nation should be met by a sufficient duty upon export bounty sugar when imported into this country.

This Mr. President, is the sum and substance of the petition which I have the honor to present.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask, if in order, to have the indorsement on the petition read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The indorsement on the petition will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Petition of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, Pa., favoring the imposition of adequate duties on sugars.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill to which the petition refers having been reported, the petition will lie on the table.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 72) to permit Capt. T. O. Selfridge, jr., United States Navy, to receive a decoration conferred upon him by the President of the Republic of France, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a bill (S. 1855) to provide for the closing of part of an alley in square 622, in the city of Washington, D. C., and for the relief of the president and directors of Gonzaga College; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 1858) to grant an honorable discharge to George S. Raymond, late captain Company G, Sixty-fifth Regiment New York Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GORDON introduced a bill (S. 1859) for the relief of the owners of the steamer Leesburg; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DOLPH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PERKINS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COKE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

BERING SEA AWARD.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask that the vote be reconsidered by which an order was made yesterday to print certain papers coming from the President of the United States in regard to the Bering Sea tribunal; and I ask that the papers may be allowed to be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations without an order to print, as they have to be edited before the printing can be done.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Alabama? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered.

TOWN SITES IN OKLAHOMA TERRITORY.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask an order from the Senate for the Vice-President to appoint the conferees that were directed yesterday at the further conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. 3606) to require railroad companies operating railroads in the Territories over a right of way granted by the Government to establish stations and depots at all town sites on the lines of said roads established by the Interior Department.

By unanimous consent the Vice-President was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. BERRY, Mr. BLACKBURN, and Mr. PETTIGREW were appointed.

ISSUE OF BONDS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further morning business that order is closed and the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PEFFER March 28, 1894, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and it is hereby, instructed to prepare and report as soon as practicable a bill to repeal all laws authorizing or permitting the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds or other interest-bearing obligations of the Government, and to prohibit any and all such issues in future without express authority by act of Congress first had and obtained.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yesterday, on my request, the Senate took up the bill (S. 1680) to more effectually suppress gambling in the District of Columbia, and after the bill and the amendment reported by the committee had been read its further consideration was objected to by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON], and it went over until this morning. The Senator from New Jersey has withdrawn his objection, and as the bill is short and has been read I ask that it may now be considered.

Mr. PEFFER. I yield for that purpose.

BOOKMAKING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill I have indicated.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 1680) to more effectually suppress gambling in the District of Columbia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been read at length, and the question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, which was read yesterday.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire rise to the amendment?

Mr. GALLINGER. No; but I desire to discuss the merits of the bill, and I can do that, perhaps, quite as well upon the question of the passage of the bill if the amendment shall be adopted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. What is the amendment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That the provisions of the act of Congress approved the 31st day of January, 1883, entitled "An act to more effectually suppress gambling in the District of Columbia," and also the provisions of the act of Congress approved the 2d day of March, 1891, entitled "An act to prevent bookmaking and pool-selling in the District of Columbia," shall not apply to bookmaking at the spring and fall meetings at the Bennings and Ivy City race tracks when such meetings are held by organizations duly incorporated under the laws of the District of Columbia: Provided, That such meetings shall be held only between the 1st day of March and the 15th day of December in any year, and shall not exceed a period of eighteen days each: And provided further, That there shall be but one spring meeting and but one fall meeting at each of the above-named tracks in any one year.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me that amendment ought to be printed, and then we ought to have an opportunity to examine it. If the consideration of the bill can be objected to now, I shall object.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The bill has been twice read, yesterday and the day before, and the amendment has been read. It is necessary for the bill to pass the House of Representatives, and if passed at all it should be done at once.

Mr. TELLER. If I understand it, the bill comes in with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes; and the amendment has been printed for two days.

Mr. DOLPH. Is it a committee amendment?

Mr. MCMILLAN. It is a committee amendment. The purpose of the amendment is to regulate racing in the District of Columbia, so that bookmaking will be allowed on the tracks and nowhere else, and it prohibits winter racing in the District of Columbia. The committee has carefully considered the subject, and thinks it very important that the bill should pass.

Mr. DOLPH. Do I understand the amendment which has been read is a committee amendment, to be substituted for the bill?

Mr. MCMILLAN. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know much about this bill, but it seems to be an important one. I did not know of the amendment until this moment.

Mr. MCMILLAN. The subject has been given a great deal of care by the committee, and they have gone over it two or or three times. The committee think the bill covers the ground thoroughly.

Mr. HARRIS. I think I can make a brief statement to the Senator from Colorado that will be satisfactory to him.

Mr. TELLER. All right.

Mr. HARRIS. This bill simply authorizes racing by organized associations in the spring and fall, no meeting extending beyond eighteen days, and but the two meetings annually on each of the race tracks in the District known as Bennings and Ivy City. That is all of the bill except that it authorizes pool selling on the track pending the races.

Mr. TELLER. I shall withdraw my objection; for I do not know anything about the bill and will let it go.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment which has been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator rise to the question of concurring in the amendment?

Mr. PEFFER. I object to the amendment. I objected to the consideration of the bill in the first place, but concluded to withdraw my objection with the expectation of repeating my reasons for it when the bill should be presented to the Senate.

I am not sufficiently familiar with the nomenclature of the race track to express myself intelligently perhaps upon the bill, but as I regard it, Mr. President, it proposes to relieve two classes of gamblers from the operation of existing statutes relating to the general subject of gambling. That being my understanding of the object of the bill, I should not feel that I was doing my duty properly if I sat quietly by and let such a bill pass without entering my protest against it.

I do not believe that the respectability of a gambler should shield him from the due penalties of the law. The little fellow who gambles for $10 or $20 around about the hotel corridors we send to prison, we ostracise him from society, we regard him as a man not worthy to be associated with; but men who will gamble for hundreds and thousands and even for millions of dollars are esteemed honest. It seems to me that the whole country is becoming debauched with this spirit of gambling, and I simply enter my protest against the passage of a bill which in any way recognizes it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, a few weeks ago the Committee on the District of Columbia, of which I have the honor to be a member, ordered reported a bill very similar to the bill that is now under consideration. I took exception to the report at the time and filed a minority report in behalf of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] and myself, which I shall ask to have read in a moment as part of my remarks.

I do not think that the present bill in any wise overcomes the objection I then found to the bill that the committee acted favorably upon, and I will say that the vote in committee on the present bill, or the amendment to the bill that was then ordered to be reported, was taken at a time when I was absent from the committee by my own fault, it is true, and I had not an opportunity to enter my protest against this report when it was made.

I shall now ask that the views of the minority of the Committee on the District of Columbia be read, after which I desire to add a single word.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read the views of the minority, submitted March 13, 1894, as follows:

The undersigned, a minority of the Committee on the District of Columbia, beg leave to respectfully dissent from the favorable report on the bill (S. 1680) "to more effectually suppress gambling in the District of Columbia," for the following reasons:

On the 31st day of January, 1883, an act was approved which provides—

"That every person who shall in the District of Columbia set up or keep any gambling table, or any house, vessel, or place on land or water for the purpose of gaming, or gambling device commonly called A. B. C., faro-bank, E. O., roulette, equality, keno, thimbles, or 'little joker,' or any kind of gambling table or gambling device adapted, devised, and designed for the purpose of playing any game of chance for money or property, or who shall induce, entice, or permit any person to bet or play at or upon any such gaming table or gambling device, or on the side or against the keeper thereof, shall, on conviction, be adjudged guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be punished by imprisonment for a term of not more than ten years."

That law is still in force, and doubtless does much toward suppressing gambling in the District of Columbia.

On the 21 day of March, 1891, an act was approved entitled "An act to prevent bookmaking and pool selling in the District of Columbia," the first section of which provides—

"that it shall be unlawful for any person or association of persons in the cities of Washington and Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, or within said District within 1 mile of the boundaries of said cities, to bet, gamble, or make books or pools on the result of any trotting race or running race of horses, or boat race, or race of any kind, or on any election or any contest of any kind, or game of baseball."

It is claimed that it was the intention of the last-named act to permit bookmaking and pool selling on race tracks located more than 1 mile from the boundaries of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and the language of the act seems to justify that construction. It did not, however, modify or repeal the act of January 31, 1883, and bookmaking and pool selling continue to be prohibited under that act. The present bill in its amended form will modify the act in question sufficiently to permit gambling on race tracks situated 1 mile from the boundaries of said cities.

We are of opinion that the principle embodied in the act of January 31, 1883, is a wholesome and wise provision. It absolutely prohibits gambling by cards and otherwise in all parts of the District of Columbia. The poor man who is caught at a game of policy, keno, roulette, or any other of the well-known devices of the common gambling fraternity, is punished severely; but in the face of that the present bill, misnamed "A bill to more effectually suppress gambling in the District of Columbia," proposes to legalize gambling on race tracks in the interest of the rich and the professional sporting element of the community. We believe the proposed legislation is vicious in principle, and for that reason dissent from the report of the committee, and recommend that adverse action be taken on the bill when it comes before the Senate for consideration.

J. H. GALLINGER.
REDFIELD PROCTOR.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire to occupy the attention of the Senate but a single moment in further opposition to the pending bill. My views are so clearly expressed in the minority report that it is unnecessary for me to add more than a single word.

We have in the District of Columbia a very strict and efficacious law against gambling. It prohibits the poor man from engaging in games of chance under very severe penalties. I have reason to believe that the law is being very successfully administered and that the vice of gambling is reduced to a minimum in the District. The law applies not only to the ordinary games such as policy, and roulette, and keno, and I suppose poker (games with which other Senators are perhaps more familiar than I am), but it likewise prohibits gambling on race tracks, gambling by rich men, the society men and women, the people who stake large sums of money upon the chance of horse races, not one race in a hundred of them very likely being honestly conducted, which encourages vice and, in my judgment, does more to sap the foundations of morality so far as this question is concerned than all the gambling that is engaged in by the poor men of this District.

It is proposed by the pending bill to name two certain associations which may for the space of thirty six days in each year permit gambling on race tracks, and hence to that extent it is a repeal of the existing statute. I do not believe the people of the District of Columbia are prepared to encourage legislation of this kind. There has been no petition praying for this change in the law. The citizens of the District have not asked for it, and I do not believe the citizens of the District desire it. But, certain racing corporations, certain men who are interested in trials of speed, more particularly as I look upon it for the reason that it encourages what they call a good time and permits, if this legislation is enacted, gambling in its worst form, are here urging that the law shall be amended as is proposed. New Jersey has driven from its borders this class of men. Almost every State in the American Union is prohibiting this sort of thing.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the Senator from New Hampshire name any State in the Union of forty-four States, except New Jersey, that prohibits it?

Mr. GALLINGER. I am very clear that I could do so if I should refer to the statutes. I know that my own State prohibits it.

Mr. PLATT. And Connecticut.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think Connecticut prohibits it, and I am very sure almost all the States of the North do. New Jersey has driven from its borders this class of men. They came here a few months ago and flaunter before the citizens of the District their purpose to conduct winter racing here in violation of law. The very track they occupied is included in the bill, and it is proposed now to legalize this gambling device.

Mr. President, I believe it is vicious legislation; I believe it is wrong legislation, and I believe the Senate of the United States ought not to give it its approval. It is proposed that the races shall occur in May and December each year, which comes very near being winter racing, and that even the racing fraternity, I believe, concede ought not to be permitted. I read in the Star an evening or two ago, I think last evening, an editorial bearing on this question; and I submit that the newspapers of the District are very fair in dealing with all matters which concern the welfare of the city of Washington and the District of Columbia. The editorial to which I refer is as follows:

Members of the National Legislature who are really interested in the welfare of the District of Columbia might well, in some of the frequent modifications of the race-track bookmaking bill, amend it by limiting the bookmaking to months suitable for racing. December is unfit; so, ordinarily, is March. There should be absolute prohibition of bookmaking except during months when pleasant racing weather may reasonably be expected. Racing that is merely an excuse for bookmaking operations should be stopped completely. Washington does not want and will not endure the location here, even on the fringe only of winter, of that all-the-year-around race gambling gang which was ignominiously defeated last winter by the United States district attorney.

Mr. President, I go further than the editor of that paper, because I oppose the matter in toto, and trust the bill will be rejected by the Senate. Having said this much, I shall content myself by recording my vote against it, trusting that the Senate will second my demand for a yea-and-nay vote on this important question.

Mr. LODGE. I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire, before he takes his seat, what is the present condition of the law? Does the law now prevent bookmaking and winter racing?

Mr. GALLINGER. Absolutely, I will state to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Under the existing law there is no possibility for legal bookmaking at any season of the year?

Mr. GALLINGER. There is none whatever.

Mr. LODGE. Then the bill proposes to legalize bookmaking during the period when it could not otherwise be carried on?

Mr. GALLINGER. It amends the existing law to that extent.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, it occurs to me the bill ought not to pass the Senate. I move to strike out all of the substitute from the third line down to and including the word "provided" in the thirteenth line; in line 13 to strike out the word "such" and insert in lieu thereof the word "racing;" in the same line to strike out the word "shall" and insert "may;" in line 14 to strike out the word "March" and insert "April;" in the same line to strike out the word "fifteenth" and insert "first;" in the fifteenth line to strike out the word "any" and insert "each;" in the same line, after the word "year," to insert "within the District of Columbia," and after the word "each" in line 16 to strike out the additional proviso in the following words:

And provided further, That there shall be but one spring meeting, and but one fall meeting at each of the above-named tracks in any one year.

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That racing meetings may be held only between the 1st day April and 1st day of December in each year within the District of Columbia, and shall not exceed a period of eighteen days each.

That, I understand, would leave the present law in force against bookmaking and prohibit all gambling upon the race tracks and in connection with racing. I know of no reason why a monopoly of racing in the racing season should be conferred upon some corporations organized under the laws of this District.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the Senator from Nebraska allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Neither of the racing associations named in the bill was organized under the laws of the District. They were chartered by act of Congress.

Mr. ALLEN. I stand corrected. I meant to say that they were chartered by act of Congress. I know of no reason why Congress should grant a monopoly of horse-racing to those associations. It strikes me that about the only thing Congress should do with reference to horse-racing is to prohibit gambling in connection with it, to prevent cruelty to the animals engaged in it, and to hedge in that kind of amusement by laws making it as harmless as possible. The amendment would leave the existing laws in force in the District so that they could be enforced against bookmaking and all species of gambling in connection with race tracks.

Mr. LODGE. I ask for the reading of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the question. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] to the amendment agreed to as in Committee of the Whole. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment so as to make the bill read:

That racing meetings may be held only between the 1st day of April and 1st day of December in each year within the District of Columbia, and shall not exceed a period of eighteen days each.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I wish to inquire of the Senator from Nebraska if the amendment he proposes will leave the present law intact. I understand that the law now prohibits pool-selling anywhere in the District of Columbia, and these race tracks are located within the District.

Mr. ALLEN. That is precisely right.

Mr. MCPHERSON. The amendment allows race meetings simply and purely.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCPHERSON. And confers upon the associations no power to sell pools or conduct book-making at the race tracks?

Mr. ALLEN. It prohibits book-making and every species of gambling in connection with racing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLEN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULLOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. If he were present I should vote "yea" on the amendment.

Mr. SHOUP (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from California [Mr. WHITE]. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. QUAY. I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who is absent.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask if the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted, the Chair is advised.

Mr. DUBOIS. Unless his colleague [Mr. MCPHERSON] can tell me how he would vote I will withhold my vote.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I can not inform the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. DUBOIS. I withhold my vote.

Mr. PUGH (after having voted in the negative). I inquire if the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. PUGH. I have a standing pair with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and as I do not know how he would vote, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CAREY (after having voted in the affirmative). I should like to inquire whether the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted, the Chair is informed.

Mr. CAREY. I ask permission to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY].

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 21; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to amend an act approved January 31, 1883, entitled 'An act to more effectually suppress gambling in the District of Columbia,'" and so forth.

ISSUE OF BONDS.

Mr. PEFFER. I ask that the resolution submitted by me some days ago be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER]; which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PEFFER March 28, 1894, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and it is hereby, instructed to prepare and report as soon as practicable a bill to repeal all laws authorizing or permitting the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds or other interest-bearing obligations of the Government, and to prohibit any and all such issues in future without express authority by act of Congress first had and obtained.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. Prdsident, the time has come when it is necessary for the people to lay heavy hands on their public agents. It has become fashionable for men to procure office by means of false pretenses, and it has resulted in vicious legislation and destructive government.

A national convention representing a great political party, in 1888, pledged itself, its voters, its candidates, and its policy in these words:

The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money, and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver.

Bimetallism was proclaimed to be an American doctrine—one that we had inherited and that we had adopted and practiced because it was to our interest to do so. And this great party organization, through its regularly chosen channels of communication with the voters of the country, says:

We demand "the use of both gold and silver as standard money."

As "standard," remember—standard money, which means the lawful money of the country, one standard made of two metals, as we had it continuously from the beginning of our Government until 1873—a bimetallic standard, gold and silver as one equal, full legal-tender money of ultimate payment.

The people were taught to believe that this was a free-coinage platform, and they were led to believe that with the success of the Republican party would come a restoration of the monetary system we had before the fatal act of silver demonetization, February 12, 1873.

In a speech delivered in this Chamber on the 17th day of June, 1890, the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] used the following words, when referring to the attitude of his party in 1888, with respect to the restoration of silver to its old place as a money metal:

The open and avowed views of ex-President Cleveland, while they convinced nobody apparently, either in the Democracy or out of it, were yet sufficient to paralyze the efforts of the friends of silver in both political parties to secure its full recognition. The day star of hope did not rise for us until the national convention of 1888. Then the Republican convention declared for silver. It seems droll now to recall the enthusiasm created in the far West in the last campaign. The Republican candidate for the Presidency had been in public life, but his utterances had not been many or particularly important. * * * But we hunted up the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and being ardent and sanguine, and our hearts being illumined with hope, many of us found here and there a phrase or a sentence which indicated a friendly feeling for silver. And we labored among the farmers in the valleys and on the plains and with the toilers in the mining camps in the mountain gulches and canyons with these as texts.

The party was successful at the polls and its candidate for the Presidency was inaugurated March 4, 1889. An attempt was made to carry a silver-coinage bill through Congress and it ended in the enactment of what became known as the Sherman law, because of a few words which the Senator of that name succeeded in getting incorporated in the body of the law which took out of it about all that there was vital in it. The great Senator whose name the law now bears can take to himself all the credit that is due for openly, and in the very face of the people's protests, thrusting aside his party pledges, and again defeating the popular will.

When it was proposed in August, 1893, to repeal so much of the Sherman law as authorized the purchase of silver, a large majority of Republican Senators were found voting with their venerable leader to complete the work of destruction which he began twenty years before, and thus get rid of the last bit of legislation that authorized the coinage of standard silver money.

In 1892, with its platform record favoring silver money, this powerful party, then in power, and having violated its pledges by the enactment of the Sherman law, held another national convention, and announced its position on the money question in these words:

The American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetallism, and the Republican party demands the use of gold and silver as standard money.

The party vote in both Houses of Congress on the repeal of the Sherman law is sufficient by way of comment.

The party promises and pledges in favor of silver money, but the party votes against it—an open, bold defiance of the popular will in the interest of speculators who prey upon the substance of the people.

In 1884, the Democratic party in national convention assembled, officially said to the people:

We believe in honest money, the gold and silver coinage of the Constitution, and a circulating medium convertible into such medium without loss.

With those words in its platform and with the free-silver coinage oratory of its speakers and the "honest-money" editorials of its newspapers writers, the party was successful in the election of that year. But the Administration of President Cleveland was so hostile to the coinage and use of silver as money that not a word was said on the subject in the party platform of 1888, and the party was defeated.

Profiting by experience, the party pledged itself strongly in 1892, when it declared its monetary policy in these words:

We hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country, and to the coinage of both gold and silver, without discrimination against either metal and without charge for minting.

That was intended to be construed and it was construed to mean a free and unlimited gold and silver coinage declaration, and the party made a successful campaign with it. But within four months after the new President's inauguration he called Congress together in extraordinary session for the single purpose of repealing the purchasing clause of the Sherman law, which the Ohio Senator had himself proposed to do by bill only a short time before.

A Democratic House, elected on a free-coinage platform, gave a large majority vote in favor of supporting the President's gold monometallic doctrine and a Democratic Senate, alike pledged to a free-coinage policy, violated its solemn party pledges and gave one-half its party vote in favor of discarding a policy which had descended to it from the fathers of the Republic. The President and both Houses of Congress—all Democratic—united in an open betrayal of the people who intrusted them with power.

In view of these facts, it is not surprising that the present Administration, aided and abetted by the able and trusted financial leader of the Republicans—that subtle financier and monetary diplomat, whose footprints are clearly traceable in our fiscal legislation since 1869—the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] should brush the laws aside and issue interest bearing obligations of the Government with which to replenish a gold reserve that has been maintained without the mandate of law nearly twenty years and used as a fund for speculators to gamble with.

After the approval of the act of May 31, 1878, there was no need of any redemption fund, and there has not been any legal requirement for such a fund since.

That law was a short one, easily understood, and enacted in compliance with the almost unanimous desire of the people of the United States that our greenback currency should not be retired.

That law reads:

[PUBLIC—No. 65.]

An act to forbid the further retirement of United States legal-tender notes.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That from and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful for the Secretary of the Treasury or other officer under him to cancel or retire any more of the United States legal-tender notes. And when any of said notes may be redeemed or be received into the Treasury under any law from any source whatever and shall belong to the United States, they shall not be retired, canceled, or destroyed, but they shall be reissued and paid out again and kept in circulation: Provided, That nothing herein shall prohibit the cancellation and destruction of mutilated notes and the issue of other notes of like denomination in their stead, as now provided by law.

All acts and parts of acts in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Approved May 31, 1878.

There has at all times been money enough in the Treasury to exchange for United States notes (greenbacks) as they were presented for exchange.

I have here a table copied from the Statistical Abstract for 1892, showing the amount of gold money, coin and bullion, in the Treasury on the 1st day of July in each year from 1879 to 1892, inclusive, showing that there was at all times an abundance of money with which to redeem the greenbacks as they were presented without any extra draft for gold whatever, and these figures will show that over and above the amount of the $100,000,000 reserve, that is so frequently spoken of, there was an abundance of gold with which to make this redemption.

The table is as follows:

Amount of gold coin and bullion in the Treasury and gold certificates in the United States on July 1 of each year from 1879 to 1892, inclusive.

[From the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.]

Mr. President, I see that the hour of 2 o'clock is about to arrive, and I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may lie over, to be called up again to morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived the Chair lays before Senate the unfinished business. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER] requests that the resolution may lie over, and that it be again laid before the Senate to-morrow.

Mr. PEFFER. And that I may conclude my remarks then, during the morning hour.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly there ought to be no objection to the request.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before the resolution goes over I give notice of an amendment to the resolution. I propose to insert after the word "practicable," in the second and third lines of the resolution, the words, "if they shall deem it expedient."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. HARRIS and others. No objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The unfinished business will be proceeded with.

THE REVENUE BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is entitled to the floor.

[Mr. ALLISON resumed the floor and concluded the speech begun by him yesterday. See Appendix.]

Mr. PEFFER and Mr. MILLS addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Kansas, if he desires to address the Senate.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Kansas to yield to me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Texas or the Senator from Florida?

Mr. PEFFER. For what purpose?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is unadvised.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, I do not desire to proceed with the discussion of the pending bill at this hour; but I wish to retain the floor, so that in the morning, when the proper time comes, I shall be permitted to proceed. With that understanding I yield to the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL].

Mr. MILLS. If the Senator from Kansas will yield to me this evening, my friend from Florida agrees to yield, I shall yield the floor after I conclude my remarks, and the Senator from Kansas can take the floor again in the morning.

Mr. PEFFER. That will be agreeable to me.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Texas.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to only one subject discussed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] this afternoon, and that is the question of the specific as against the ad valorem system of taxation.

I have no quarrel with Republican Senators or members of the House of Representatives, or Republican people who believe in a protective tariff, who favor duties so imposed upon articles as to exclude importations, and give a monopoly of the American market to the American producer. I say I have no quarrel with them because the specific system of taxation is the most efficient instrument for the execution of that policy.

What is the specific system which has been so extolled by my friend from Iowa? It is a tax levied on the article by specific quantities, disregarding value. The Democratic system of taxation is a taxation levied ad valorem, interpreted into English "according to value."

No other tax imposed by law, either national, State, or local, is a just and equal tax upon the taxpayer. The specific system of taxation is un-American, unequal, unjust, and un-Democratic. It is in perfect harmony with Republican principles. It is in perfect harmony with that policy that would build up a rich, a powerful, a governing class in the community.

But, sir, the institutions which have been established by our fathers in this country, and established primarily to secure and perpetuate the liberties of the people, are based upon the fundamental rock of ages, that all legislation of the Government must rest upon the principle of the absolute equality of the citizens in the Government. Equality of right is the fundamental principle upon which all free people associate wherever they do associate in the compacts of government.

Hence a tax by value and not the tax by quantity is the tax of equality. A tax on an acre of land of $1 when the land is worth $100 an acre, and on another acre of land at $1 when the land is worth $1 an acre, is a tax to burden the poorer part of the community one hundred times more than it does the richer part of the community. How can any man stand in the blaze of the civilization of the nineteenth century and in the midst of a legislative assembly of a free people demand that a tax shall be imposed whose purpose is, first, to conceal from the taxpayer the burden which is being placed upon him; and, second, a tax that from the day of imposition grows day by day more burdensome as long as it lasts? These are the two distinguishing features of the specific system of taxation.

Mr. President, the values of all products made by human labor, and especially those made by machinery, are falling all over the world and have been falling for fifty or sixty years. Therefore, when a tax of a dollar per pound is to-day placed on an article that is worth $1, as the article falls by the decreasing of the cost of production, by the multiplying of the forces of production, the tax grows and becomes more burdensome; and the distinguished Senator from Iowa in his speech commended it for that very feature. He indorsed that feature, a feature that makes the tax grow more burdensome year by year.

Mr. President, it is a principle acknowledged in all our courts that a tax is a burden on the taxpayer, and a people who believe in just taxation to support the necessary wants of the Government maintain that that burden ought to be made by the Government as light as possible to meet the necessary wants of the Government. But the Senator from Iowa commends the other principle of taxation, that makes the burden grow heavier and heavier from the moment of its imposition.

If a specific tax is the tax, and the only tax that is right, why does my friend from Iowa and my other friends on the other side of the Chamber insist on having so many ad valorem articles in their existing tariff law?

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MILLS. I was going to answer that question myself.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. MILLS. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If a specific duty is un-American, un-Democratic, oppressive, and wrong, as the Senator has characterized it, why is it that the bill contains within its provision between two and three hundred items upon which specific duties are laid?

Mr. MILLS. As my friend from Oregon and I are both Yankees, I will answer his question by asking him another. The Senator from Iowa said the doctrine of ad valorem duty is an ignorant and an antiquated doctrine. If that be true, why did he and why did the Senator from Oregon put so many ad valorem duties in the existing law?

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. MILLS. Certainly; with pleasure.

Mr. ALLISON. I said the ad valorems were put in because the people who made tariffs were ignorant necessarily of the relations as to quantity, and therefore, where tariffs were made in pursuance of expert knowledge, as in France, Germany, and England, there are few or no ad valorem duties.

Mr. MILLS. Now I will answer my friend from Oregon. I want to be frank and honest about all these things. I do not wish to deceive anybody. All legislation is a compromise. I am giving my opinion now, not the opinion of anybody else on this side of the Chamber. There are gentlemen on this side of the Chamber who are protectionists. There are gentlemen here who believe in specific duties, and who believe in them for the same reason you believe in them and who advocate them for the same reason you advocate them. But I believe that taxation can only justly be imposed upon a people for the purpose of raising a sufficient amount of money to run an honest administration of the Government, and that when so imposed it must be imposed upon the people so as to fall equally upon the taxpayers. That can only be done when you tax by value.

I should like to know if there ever has been a man in any State in this Union since the organization of the Federal Government who has ever intimated any such thing in a State Legislature as the imposition of taxation upon property according to quantity. How are your State governments supported? By taxation alone. There is not a community in any State in this Union that would not overturn any party at the first time it had an opportunity under its law that dared to impose such a taxation as is now advocated for the Federal Government. No such system has ever been imposed in any State, in any county, in any community. All the vast and complicated systems of taxation in our Government are by value. But it is contended that the ad valorem system opens up a door to undervaluation and fraud. Certainly; any system does. The thing that multiplies the frauds, the smuggling, the undervaluations, the underweightings, the under-descriptions, all these things arise out of the intensity of the burden placed upon the shoulders of the taxpayer.

The venerable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], whom I do not now see in his seat, came before the Committee on Ways and Means when my friend from Maine [Mr. FRYE] and I were on it, and we had a long struggle with the sugar duties. They were specific, but the Government was losing heavily under their operation. The Secretary of the Treasury said the Government Treasury was being robbed of millions by this specific system of taxation that we are taught is infallible and can not err. The committee studied over the proposition a long time until they abandoned the color test and adopted a new system that would point out more nearly the actual value of the sugar to be taxed.

You have a tax on opium by the pound, an enormous tax, not imposed this time to build up an American industry, because there is no opium industry in the United States, but imposed this time to moralize people and correct their bad habits. What has been the result? We have recently passed through one of the most shameless scandals that has ever occurred in our Government, which showed that nearly every officer on our Pacific coast in the Northwestern territory was involved in that scandal. Bribery and corruption ran rampant through the specific system that did not secure the Treasury against smuggling and fraud.

A few years ago while I was a member of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives a distinguished manufacturer from Pennsylvania, himself one of the members of the tariff commission selected by President Arthur, Mr. Oliver, came before the committee and said: "There are great frauds in the importation of iron. The finest Swedish bars, taxed by specific duties so much per pound, are cut up, thrown into salt and water and rusted, and brought in as old scrap iron," when the Swedish bars were valued at perhaps five times as much as scrap iron. I could stand here and enumerate any number of instances: I have a list of them here, but I will not take up the time of the Senate. Why is it? It is because the people want the trade. It is because the owners of these products want to get them into a market and make a profit, and it is because you say to them by your specific duties, intended so to operate, "You shall not enter. We have made these duties purposely to keep you out. We have made these duties purposely to give a monopoly to the American manufacturers of these articles. We intend to keep you out."

Then the man tries to beat the law. But if you put a low duty the man will pay the duty. He will have no object in trying to smuggle and undervalue if he can come in, because if he can come in at all he transfers to the shoulders of the consumer the burden of taxation which he pays for entering. If you want to stop undervaluations reduce your duties; and if you reduce your duties and put them on an ad valorem basis so that the people can all see them, the goods will all come in and the people will know just exactly what amount of burden they are bearing to support their Government.

Mr. President, I have here an official report from the Secretary of the Interior in relation to the wealth of the United States. I was struck with this table when I saw it the other day. The Secretary gives us the assessed valuation for taxation in 1850, 1860, 1870, 1880, and 1890. Notwithstanding the very low revenue tariff of 1850, a tariff every item of whose duty was ad valorem and a tariff that had the indorsement of the distinguished Senator from Iowa as having been the best tariff that has ever been made in the history of the Government, the assessed valuation of property for taxation in the United States was $6,000,000,000. The true valuation was $7,000,000,000. It was valued at 84.43 per cent of its true value. In 1860, when the duties were still lower by the tariff of 1857, the taxes still more easy to pay, the assessed valuation was 74.79 of the true valuation. In 1870 a change had come over the spirit of the dreams of the taxpayers of the United States. The burden was harder to bear. Now come your frauds and your undervaluations in the States as well as in the imports from foreign countries, and the assessed valuation was 47.59 per cent of the true valuation. In 1880 it was 39.28 per cent of the true valuation and in 1890 it is shown to be 39.17 of the true valuation. Why is it that the people of the United States have so far undervalued their property? It is because of the depression of the country. It is because the chief occupation of the laboring people of this country has been to pay taxes, and not taxes to support the Government that protects them in the enjoyment of their natural and acquired rights, but taxes to build up a powerful and controlling class that is to put its foot upon their neck. That is why it is that the barometer is falling so fast and so far.

Sir, when we had the tariff of 1846 the country never saw such a period of prosperity. There was but little talk about undervaluations. The people were trading, our imports were increasing, our exports were increasing, and the value of all the property of the country rose at the rate of 12.6 per cent per annum for ten years. Who has ever seen such an exhibition of the prosperity of a country?

But my friend from Iowa calls attention to the ad valorem system adopted, and shows how it would work on hay from Canada, and he quotes a provision of the bill. He said:

> Let me illustrate some of the items in this bill. I notice that the Committee on Finance have changed hay from rate of duty in the existing law of $4 a ton and from the House bill which reduces the duty to $2 a ton, to 20 per cent ad valorem. There is laid down in section 40 of the bill a principle of dutiable value which declares that the values shall be ascertained by the appraiser in the principal markets of the country whence exported. Here is hay, which comes from the Dominion of Canada into our country on a shore line with an artificial boundary of more than 4,000 miles. Therefore it is opening up to the Dominion of Canada the market for hay in competition with our farmers at 20 per cent ad valorem. That hay will come from Nova Scotia; it will come from New Brunswick; it will come from the upper and lower provinces of Canada; it will come from Manitoba. Is this 20 per cent ad valorem to be levied upon hay at Halifax or at St. Johns or at Montreal?

I will answer the Senator's question by giving him the language of the existing law, of which he is the father:

> That it shall be the duty of the appraisers of the United States, and every of them, and every person who shall act as such appraiser, or of the collector, as the case may be, by all reasonable ways and means in his or their power to ascertain, estimate, and appraise (any invoice or affidavit thereto or statement of cost, or of cost of production to the contrary notwithstanding) the actual market value and wholesale price of the merchandise at the time of exportation to the United States in the principal markets of the country whence the same has been imported.

My friend arraigns the Democratic committee in the other House for adopting a new principle, when he is slaughtering his own offspring, for they copied that part of it from his own bill, the existing law.

Mr. ALDRICH. When it is convenient to the Senator from Texas I should like to ask him a question.

Mr. MILLS. I do not want to take the time of my friend from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER] and my friend from Florida [Mr. CALL]. I suppose I had better conclude.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will wait until the Senator is through, but whenever it is convenient to him or whenever he is through I should like to ask him a question or two.

Mr. MILLS. We will have lots of time to answer questions. There will be questions on both sides before we get through.

I wish to confine myself very closely to the question of specific and ad valorem duties. My distinguished friend from Iowa says there has been but one Secretary of the Treasury who has favored ad valorem duties. He is mistaken. Ad valorem duties have been favored by Secretaries Walker, Guthrie, Cobb, and Carlisle. I will give extracts from all of them, but before doing so I will give an extract from the message of President Polk, December 2, 1845.

In that message he says:

> I recommend to Congress the abolition of the minimum principle, or assumed, arbitrary, and false values, and of specific duties, and the substitution in their place of ad valorem duties as the fairest and most equitable indirect tax which can be imposed. By the ad valorem principle all articles are taxed according to their cost or value, and those which are of inferior quality or of small cost bear only the just proportion of the tax with those which are of superior quality or greater cost. The articles consumed by all are taxed at the same rate.
> A system of ad valorem revenue duties, with proper discriminations and proper guards against frauds in collecting them, it is not doubted will afford ample incidental advantages to the manufacturers, and enable them to derive as great profits as can be derived from any other regular business. It is believed that such a system, strictly within the revenue standard, will place the manufacturing interests on a stable footing and inure to their permanent advantage; while it will, as nearly as may be practicable, extend to all the great interests of the country the incidental protection which can be afforded by our revenue laws. Such a system, when once firmly established, would be permanent and not subject to the constant complaints, agitations, and changes which must ever occur when duties are not laid for revenue, but for the "protection merely" of a favored interest.

In the deliberations of Congress on this subject it is hoped that a spirit of mutual concession and compromise between conflicting interests may prevail, and that the result of their labors may be crowned with the happiest consequences.

The next I will give is from the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. Robert J. Walker, made to Congress December 3, 1845, in which he says:

Minimums are a fictitious value, assumed by law, instead of the real value and the operation of all minimums may be illustrated by a single example. Thus, by the tariff of 1842, a duty of 30 per cent ad valorem is levied on all manufactures of cotton; but the law further provides that cotton goods "not dyed, colored, printed, or stained, not exceeding in value 20 cents per square yard, shall be valued at 20 cents per square yard." If, then, the real value of the cheapest cotton goods is but 4 cents a square yard, it is placed by the law at the false value of 20 cents per square yard, and the duty levied on the fictitious value, raising it five times higher on the cheap article consumed by the poor than upon the fine article purchased by the more wealthy. Indeed, by House Document No. 308, of the first session of the Twenty-eighth Congress, this difference, by actual importation, was 65 per cent between the cheaper and the finer article of the 20 per cent minimum, 131 per cent on the 30 per cent minimum, 48½ per cent on the 35 per cent minimum, 84 per cent on the 60 per cent minimum, and 84 per cent on the 75 per cent minimum.

This difference is founded on actual importation, and shows an average discrimination against the poor on cotton imports of 83 per cent beyond what the tax would be if assessed upon the actual value. The operation of the specific duty presents a similar discrimination against the poor and in favor of the rich. Thus, upon salt the duty is not upon the value, but it is 8 cents a bushel, whether the article be coarse or fine, showing by the same document, from actual importation, a discrimination of 64 per cent against the cheap and in favor of the finer article; and this, to a greater or less extent, is the effect of all specific duties. When we consider that $2,892,621.74 of the revenue last year was collected by minimum duties, and $13,311,035.46 by specific duties, the discrimination against the cheaper article must amount, by estimates founded on the same document, to a tax of $5,103,422 exacted by minimums and specific duties annually from the poorer classes by raising thus the duties on the cheaper articles above what they would be if the duties were assessed upon the actual value.

If direct taxes were made specific, they would be intolerable. Thus, if an annual tax of $30 was assessed on all houses, without respect to their actual value, making the owner of the humble tenement or cabin pay a tax of $30 and the owner of the costly mansion a tax of but $30 on their respective houses, it would differ in degree, but not in principle, from the same unvarying specific duty on cheap as on fine articles. If any discrimination should be made, it should be the reverse of the specific duty, and of the minimum principle, by establishing a maximum standard, above which value the duties on the finer article should be higher, and below which they should be lower on the cheaper article. The tax upon the actual value is the most equal, and can only be accomplished by ad valorem duties.

Again from the report of Secretary Walker, December 9, 1846, in which he says:

At the date of the repeal of the tariff of 1842, the revenue was declining. The receipts under it into the Treasury were less by the sum of $815,444.83 during the last fiscal year terminating on the 30th June, 1846, than the receipts during the fiscal year ending on the 30th June, 1845.

That this decline was progressive, and arose from the prohibitory character of the specific duties, is proved by the table hereto annexed (marked G), from which it appears that, for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1844, the excess of revenue produced by specific over ad valorem duties was $81,860.74; whereas, during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1845, the ad valorem exceeded the specific duties $1,737,379.57; and, during the last fiscal year, the ad valorem exceeded the specific duties $2,663,534.91. As the specific duties in their practical operation were becoming every day more prohibitory, the revenue under the tariff of 1842 must have continued to sink so rapidly as soon to have caused a great deficit, even in time of peace, and thus have required ultimately a resort to direct taxes or excises to support the Government.

Also I quote from his report December 8, 1847, as follows:

It is not only the reduced duties that have produced these happy results, but the mode of reduction—the substitution of ad valorem for unequal and oppressive minimum and specific duties. The higher duty was thus always imposed, by the very nature of the duty, upon the articles of the lowest value consumed by the poor, and the lower duty assessed upon the articles of higher value, used by the more wealthy, often operating at a duty of 10, 20, or 30 per cent upon the higher priced goods, and of 100 or 200 per cent ad valorem upon articles of lower price. Nearly the entire burden of the tariff was thus thrown upon labor, by whose wages, chiefly, the cheaper articles were purchased, whilst capital, with whose profits the more costly goods were bought, was almost exempt from the tax. It never would have been tolerated to have imposed a duty of 10, 20, or 30 per cent by name upon costly articles, and 100 or 200 per cent upon cheaper fabrics, when the ad valorem rates would have exhibited the injustice and inequality of the duty; but it was accomplished by minimum and specific duties, which assessed a higher duty in proportion to value upon the cheaper articles and the lower duty upon similar articles more costly in price, thus imposing the higher duty upon labor and the wages of labor as effectually as though the tax-gatherer had collected from the workingman a third or fourth of his wages every day, whilst capital was comparatively exempt from taxation.

Such is the system which has been overthrown by the substitution of the reduced ad valorem, operating the reverse of the former system, in favor of the poor and the wages of labor as far as any tariff can so operate, and, as we see, even with lower duties collecting a larger revenue. A tax in proportion to the value of imports or property must always be more productive than one which is the reverse of that rule, or which disregards it altogether. Thus, if we impose a tax of $10 each upon all houses, it must produce less revenue than the ad valorem tax in proportion to value, because the former tax would fall most heavily upon the poor, who are least able to bear it, and more lightly upon the wealthy, who had greater means of payment; and thereby revenue would be diminished. Thus, if the tax of $10 were imposed alike on the cabin and the costly dwelling, it would bring less revenue than if the same rate ad valorem, beginning with the lowest, at the rate of $10, were assessed in proportion to the value upon all houses. Indeed, the tax upon the cabin might be reduced to a dollar, or say 1 per cent, and applied ad valorem to all dwellings, and it would yield a larger revenue than the anti ad valorem specific tax of $10 upon all houses, irrespective of their value, which is no more unjust or unequal than the same minimum or specific duties upon hats, caps, boots, shoes, etc., and like articles of import, without regard to their value. The ad valorem duty incorporates itself inseparably with the exact value of the article, and collects the tax in exact proportion to the value—the form which, of all others, must yield the largest revenue.

Again, in the same report:

Pennsylvania, surpassingly rich in coal and iron, and but a year since so unanimous for protection, has tried low duties. Her coal and iron pour forth their treasures in increasing abundance; her breadstuffs and provisions find a better and more abundant market; her agriculture, commerce, her manufactures and navigation, her mines, farmers, and merchants and seamen, manufacturers and mechanics, and above all, her toiling workmen, with enhanced wages, and every pursuit of industry blessed with increased prosperity, rise up in favor of the new and more liberal commercial policy; and her people, by a majority unprecedented, largest in the counties where her iron and coal do most abound, recall their former verdict in favor of protection, and Pennsylvania becomes the very keystone of the arch of commercial freedom, which must span the hemisphere we inhabit and unite the interests of mankind.

Also from the report of Hon. James Guthrie, Secretary of the Treasury, December 4, 1854:

The present tariff has eight schedules, or different rates of duties, as follows: The first of 100 per cent, the second of 40 per cent, the third of 30 per cent, the fourth of 25 per cent, the fifth of 20 per cent, the sixth of 15 per cent, the seventh of 10 per cent, and the eighth of 5 per cent. The bill prepared by the committee of the House of Representatives has five schedules, as follows: The first of 100 per cent, the second of 30 per cent, the third of 15 per cent, the fourth of 10 per cent, and the fifth of 5 per cent. And the bill prepared at this Department, and which is substantially the one reported by the minority of the committee of the House of Representatives, has but two rates of duty: The first of 100 per cent, and the second of 25 per cent. There are difficulties in the execution of the present tariff growing out of the required classification under the eight schedules; and these difficulties continue to increase by the acts of manufacturers in assimilating one class of goods to another, and in ascertaining the material of chief value in the fabrics. The difficulties would be reduced under the bill of the committee, and would entirely disappear under that proposed by the Department.

Secretary Guthrie says also in his Report on Finances, December 3, 1855:

In remodeling the tariff act of 1846, I think it would be proper to retain Schedule A of that act, and constitute another schedule to include iron, manufactures of iron, steel, manufactures of steel, sugar, wines, and all fabrics of which silk, wool, cotton, flax, or hemp is a component part, whether manufactured in whole or in part, and to impose a duty on the same of 25 or 30 per cent, except flannels and cloths costing less than $2 per yard, and blankets, and to reconstruct the free list so as to include all the raw material used in our manufactures as proposed in my last report; and to impose on all articles not in the above schedules, or in the free list, a duty of not less than 15 nor more than 20 per cent.

Under a tariff act so constructed there would be little or no difficulty in carrying it into execution in the same way in all the ports, and in properly classing the articles under the schedules in the same port; nor in the collecting officers understanding exactly what duty was to be levied upon each article, nor the importer the amount required to be paid; and would certainly take less time at the port of entry, and require fewer officials to execute the law. The rate of duty under the proposed schedule, and of all other articles except Schedule A and the free list, could be so fixed as to make the necessary reduction, and leave the annual revenue to increase or diminish, as the imports of duty-paying merchandise should increase or diminish.

After the passage of the act of 3d of March 1857, the country was visited by a panic. Importations fell off, and the revenues were greatly reduced. Hon. Howell Cobb, then Secretary of the Treasury, in his report to Congress of December 6, 1858, recommended an increase of duties on imports, and in his recommendation adhered to the principles of the then existing ad valorem tariff of 1857. In that report he says:

Adhering to the principles of the present tariff act, I would recommend such changes as will produce the amount required for the public service. In accordance with the suggestion contained in my last annual report, I recommend that Schedules C, D, F, G, and H be raised respectively to 25, 20, 15, 10, and 5 per cent. I see no good reason for having departed in the act of 1857 from the system of decimal divisions. The present state of things affords a fit opportunity of correcting the error.

I also call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to the report of the present Secretary of the Treasury made to the present Congress:

The equal distribution of the burdens of taxation—

depends not alone upon the rates of duty imposed upon the different articles, but largely upon the manner in which the amount of the duty is ascertained and fixed by the law. The basis of the duty must be a unit in some form, and the question whether it shall be computed upon the weight, quantity, number, or dimensions of the article, or upon its actual value, is one which lies at the very foundation of every proposition to impose taxes, and upon its determination depends to a great extent the justice or injustice of every revenue measure.

The imposition of specific or compound rates of duty is so inconsistent with the true principles of just taxation that nothing but the plainest necessity can justify it in any case, unless it be in a few exceptional instances where all the articles taxed at the same specific rate are so nearly equal in value that the danger of unjust discrimination is not greater than it would be if an official valuation were required. It is manifestly unjust to compel one citizen to pay the same amount of tax on a yard of cloth worth $1 that another citizen pays on a yard of cloth worth $5. In such a case it is evident that one has been taxed too much for the support of the Government or the other has been taxed too little, and the law has not dealt fairly with them in a matter which affects the equality of their rights and duties as citizens.

A tariff is a tax upon consumption, and the condition of those who are compelled by poverty of means to purchase and use the coarser and cheaper grades of goods should certainly protect them against unjust discriminations, even if it does not entitle them to some measure of exemption from the exactions of the Government. Taxation according to value does injustice to no one, unless the rates are too high or are unequally adjusted upon articles of the same general character and utility. It is distinctly the American system of taxation, and is recognized as just and equitable by the people in all the States in their laws for the assessment and collection of local revenues upon the ad valorem basis. It is not probable that any other method would be tolerated in any State of the Union where the tax is imposed solely for the purpose of raising revenue with no incidental or ulterior object in view affecting the public health or morals; and it would never have been tolerated in our Federal legislation, except in rare instances, if the use of the taxing power had been limited to the real purpose for which it was delegated. As a means of concealing from the taxpayer the actual proportion which the charge upon his earnings bears to the value of the taxed article, specific and compound rates have been for many years ingeniously employed to mask and perpetuate a system which subordinates the interests of the Government to the exactions of private individuals and corporations engaged in particular industries and trades.

But the objections urged against the ad valorem system of tariff taxation are not generally based upon the proposition that it lacks the element of justice or equality, but usually upon the grounds that it is difficult of administration, and that it furnishes strong inducements for the commission of frauds and perjuries in order to secure false valuations of imported goods. While there is some force in this contention, I am not able to see how unequal taxation can be justified upon the ground that the burdens upon the people ought to be increased in order that the labors of public officials may be diminished, or that the honest citizen should be punished in order to prevent the dishonest one from attempting to violate the law. But the difficulties of administration have always been greatly exaggerated, and so far as they really existed in former times, have now been much diminished by our increased facilities for ascertaining market values in other countries, and by the improved organization of our customs service. The markets of the world have been brought so near to each other by the use of steam and electricity that, as to all staple articles especially, it is not now much more difficult to find their cost or value abroad than at home; and if under these circumstances it shall be demonstrated that official intelligence and integrity can not be safely relied upon for an honest collection of the revenues under the existing system of indirect taxation, it will become necessary to consider whether some other method can not be devised to raise moneys for the support of the Government.

So far as the inducements to commit frauds and perjuries constitute objections, the slightest examination of the subject will show that they are much greater under the system of compound rates, which is one of the most prominent features of our existing legislation, than they could possibly be under a purely ad valorem arrangement of duties. The tariff law now in force imposes compound rates of duty upon a great many important articles in common use among the people, and which are largely imported from abroad, and in every such case a tempting premium is offered for fraudulent undervaluations by the importer or consignee. For instance, on woolen or worsted cloths, shawls and certain other manufactures of wool, worsted or hair of the camel, goat, alpaca, or other animals, valued at more than 30 cents, and not more than 40 cents per pound, the tax per pound is three and a half times the duty imposed upon a pound of unwashed wool of the first class (38½ cents), and in addition 40 per cent ad valorem; but if the goods are valued at more than 40 cents per pound the tax is four times the duty imposed upon a pound of unwashed wool of the first class 44 cents) and 50 per cent ad valorem.

Upon an importation of 100,000 pounds of such goods under this law, an undervaluation to the extent of one-half of 1 cent per pound, so as to reduce the appraisement below 40 cents a pound, would result in a clear gain to the importer and a loss to the revenue of $9,725, whereas if the compound rate imposed upon the first classification mentioned, exorbitant as it is, had been made purely ad valorem and applied to all the goods of like character and description, such undervaluation would have resulted in a gain to the importer and a loss to the revenue of only $685, being a difference of $9,040, or more than 22 per cent upon the whole cost of the importation.

This is only one provision out of a great number in the present law under which substantially the same result can be accomplished by a very small undervaluation of imported goods; and it would seem difficult to devise a scheme better calculated to encourage frauds upon the revenue and make their prevention or detection next to impossible.

Mr. Secretary Walker was during the late war the financial agent of the Government of the United States, and in an open letter written by him November 30, 1867, and addressed to the people of the United States, he says:

But there was another reason why the tariff of 1846 so soon tripled our revenue, and that was the mode of collecting the duties. The tables annexed to the Treasury reports of 1846-'47 will show, even under the tariff of 1842, that the ad valorem duties produced 20 per cent more that the specific duties. And how can it be otherwise in the absence of fraud? It may as well be said that a direct tax of 1 cent an acre on all lands or $5 on all houses will produce as large a revenue as a tax in proportion to their value. In all cases of direct or indirect taxation, the tax, in proportion to value, incorporates itself proportionately with the price, and must necessarily increase the revenue.

And now as to frauds. When there are but five or six duties, as under the tariff of 1846, and hundreds of different duties under the specific system, it is much easier to perpetrate frauds by changing names and classification of articles than by reducing their values. That there were comparatively no frauds under the tariff of 1846 is proved by the immense augmentation of revenue, but still more by the favorable balance of our foreign trade, as compared with previous systems. Thus, with imports under the tariff of 1846 valued at the custom-house at $350,000,000, if there had been an undervaluation of only 10 per cent, as compared with real values and consequent sales here, it would have turned the balance against the country from that cause alone $35,000,000 in gold a year. There is another insuperable objection to the specific system, viz, that it unnecessarily and invariably taxes labor vastly more than capital, and the poor in a much greater proportion than the rich upon the goods consumed. Under the system of specific duties of so much per pound or yard or gallon, etc., the specific duty is the same.

The rich, who purchase the costly article bearing only the same specific duty, pay, in proportion to value, less than one-half what is paid by the poor, who purchase a cheaper and less costly article. If we take all the costly articles purchased by the rich bearing, under the present tariff, the same specific duty as the inferior article bought by the poor, we will find the difference against them exceeds $25,000,000 a year. Such is the immense additional tax exacted from labor under the system of specific duties. I know how fashionable it was to denounce the entire ad valorem system of 1846 as a novelty, but the experiment was comparatively successful, and the reason why it was a novelty was that Europe is ruled by kings and oligarchies, that the laws are made by the wealthy few, and so framed as to exact the largest duty from labor and the least from capital. Switzerland, a republic, is with us on this question.

But the tariff of 1846, although it remained much longer in operation than any other tariff and produced much more beneficial results, was susceptible of great improvements, especially in its application to the present condition of our country.

I ask my friends who constructed the existing law, if the specific tax is sufficient for the collection of the revenues of the Government, why did they resort to the ad valorem duty all through the woolen schedules? The value duty is in almost all its provisions. It is on yarns, cloths, blankets, hats, flannels, dress goods, and clothing of every kind. On goods valued at not exceeding 30 cents per pound the duty is one rate, valued at not more than 40 cents another rate is prescribed, and these classifications run through the schedule.

Why is it, if your specific system is sufficient to raise the revenues, that you have resorted to the ad valorem?

Then, there is a more important question than that. If it is impossible, as my friends contend, that the appraisers can not ascertain the true value so as to reach the correct duties, how can they obtain the true value to make these classifications? And they run all through your schedules. You have got first to determine upon sufficient evidence what is the foreign value in order to make your classifications; and yet you contend that frauds will arise under that, and that there is nobody of sufficient intelligence and sufficient integrity to be trusted with the administration of that law.

Mr. President, I want to call attention a little more pointedly to the fact of the injustice of the specific system. Take the cotton schedule, and you will find that the highest duties are upon the lowest priced and the cheapest goods, and the lowest duties are upon the highest priced goods. I want to know if my friends indorse that principle of imposing taxation; and it runs throughout the entire system, and must necessarily run mathematically so; and mathematics, they tell us, is an exact science? When you say that a certain kind of goods shall pay by the yard or by the number of threads, or by any other specific designation, 25 cents or 40 cents or 50 cents, you place that tax upon the highest priced article. Then the next under that goes up, and the next still goes up. The tax goes up as the value of the thing goes down, and the tax goes up because the value goes down. It is a logical result and it can not be otherwise.

Therefore, you must contend for the un-American proposition to tax the great body of our people upon a confessed principle that the richest people in the country must pay the lowest rate of taxation and the poorest people in the country must pay the highest taxation. You can not escape it, and I am very glad that my friend has so frankly indorsed that as a correct principle of taxation.

Mr. President, I do not care to go further into this question this evening, as my friend from Florida wants to have an executive session. I suppose we shall have some considerable debate on all these questions as we go along, and we will drop a word here and a word there on each side of the Chamber. So I will yield the floor, after hearing what my friend from Rhode Island wants to say.

Mr. ALDRICH. As the Senator from Texas is swift in his championcy of this measure, and as he was a member of the somewhat celebrated subcommittee which prepared the bill, at least in its earliest stages, and has had a great deal to do with its production here in the Senate, I desire to ask him, if he is so strenuous in his opposition to specific rates, how it is and by what influences all, or nearly all, the great articles of prime necessity that are used in this country (the only exception I know of being woolen cloths) are assessed by this measure with specific duties? I should like to have him tell the Senate and the country frankly why it is, for instance, that sugar has a specific duty in this bill, why window glass has specific duties in the bill, why lumber, lead, tin plate, iron ore, rice, and all the great necessaries of life——

Mr. MILLS. And cotton goods.

Mr. ALDRICH. And cotton cloths are assessed by the bill by a mode and manner which he says is un-Democratic? Who are the men, I should like to have him tell me, who are responsible for these duties, and how does it happen that a measure is brought here and has his advocacy which contains such an un-American and un-Democratic method of assessing duties?

Mr. MILLS. I will answer my friend with a great deal of pleasure, as I expect to answer with a great deal of pleasure a number of questions of that sort, and I will answer him again as one Yankee will answer another.

A few years ago there was a tremendous agitation in the State of Iowa for protection of hides, for a duty of 15 per cent on hides; and they even quoted me all over the State of Iowa as having gone back on my free trade views on account of the fact that Texas produced a great many hides. The campaign, as my friend knows, was run over Iowa for a duty of 15 per cent on hides. When the question came up here the Iowa people struggled as though it was a case of life and death to have incorporated in the McKinley law a tax of 15 per cent on hides, and the committee at one time reported 15 per cent on hides. Now, tell me how it got out of that bill. I will tell you how. The New England people said to the committee and the party, "You shall not do it." That is all there was about it. They said, "You shall not pass any such bill here;" and the Iowa people had to submit and take in all of their campaign thunder on the subject of protection to hides. That is what is the matter with those items.

Now, we will come right down to brass tacks about this thing. You come to the confessional, and I will come to the confessional. You had gentlemen in your party who would not permit you to do that and vote with you to pass your bill. Now, as honest men, we have to admit those things. We can not pass our bill unless we make concessions.

I say again, what I said a while ago, the bill does not suit me. I am between the devil and the deep sea; and when a question is presented to me whether I shall go to the devil and sustain the McKinley law or go to sea, I am going to sea with the hope that some fair wind or tide will bring me ashore again. [Laughter.] I am going to vote for the bill, and I am going to vote for it I do not care what changes are made, so you do not make it as bad as the McKinley law.

Mr. OATES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote on this question.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman in the Hall of the House and failed to hear his name?

Mr. OATES. I was in the Hall of the House during the roll call up to the time it was interrupted by the message from the Senate, and just stepped inside the door of the cloak room when my name was called. I heard my name, but could not answer on the call.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama, of course, knows the rule.

Mr. OATES. I think I was in the Hall of the House. I so consider it.

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman from Alabama say that he was in the Hall of the House?

Mr. OATES. I stated that I was in the Hall up to the time the message from the Senate interrupted the roll call. While that was being delivered I stepped into the cloak room. Immediately afterwards my name was called. I heard it called, and I consider that I was in the Hall of the House. But from the position I was in I could not answer.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman hardly brings himself within the rule.

Mr. OATES. I do not think the gentleman from Maine stands in the position to object to my voting, because I remember distinctly that he counted me on one occasion when I was in the cloak room.

Mr. REED. I think the gentleman from Alabama was in the proper place. I am not objecting to his voting at all. I think he had the right to answer on the call from where he was. I only complain that he did not answer.

Mr. OATES. I think I was in the Hall of the House at the time.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think the gentleman comes within the spirit of the rule.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I am paired with the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. MCCALL, but voted under an understanding with him to make a quorum.

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask that my colleague, Mr. ABBOTT, be excused from attendance on account of illness.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURROWS. I am requested by my colleague, Mr. GRIFFIN, to ask that he be excused to-day on account of sickness.

There was no objection.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House do now adjourn, and ask the House to vote the motion down.

Mr. REED. I trust the gentleman from Illinois will not debate the question.

The question was taken, and the House proceeded to divide on the demand of Mr. LACEY.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 0, nays 185, not voting 167; as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was rejected.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, what is the question now before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Journal was read, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] moved the previous question upon the approval of the Journal. The vote was taken upon ordering the previous question, and, no quorum appeared, whereupon a motion to adjourn was made.

Mr. SPRINGER. A quorum having appeared, Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no intervening motion can prevent proceeding with the election case.

Mr. BURROWS. The election case has not been called up.

Mr. SPRINGER. It comes over under the rule. It is the order from day to day, without being called up.

Mr. BURROWS. That is absurd.

Mr. REED. We are in the midst of a division. We have divided once. It is too late to make that point.

Mr. BROWN. Has the Journal been approved?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. BROWN. I make the point of order that the special order should be proceeded with notwithstanding the Journal has not been approved, and I call up the contested-election case.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWN] calls up the pending contested-election case.

Mr. REED. But, Mr. Speaker, we are dividing on a proposition for the previous question on a motion to approve the Journal.

The SPEAKER. We are not dividing.

Mr. REED. We have taken one vote on it, and discovered no quorum. We have moved to adjourn, and discovered a quorum, and it seems very plain sailing that we should go on now to renew the vote to ascertain what the House will determine on the question which is before it, and on which it has divided or tried to divide, and is now trying to divide.

Mr. BROWN. I take it, Mr. Speaker, that if it is insisted upon the special order must be executed, no matter whether the Journal has been approved or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has no doubt at all that under the terms of the special order the gentleman might call up the contested-election case at any time before the reading of the Journal. The special order continues from day to day, and no motion can intervene to prevent the consideration of the case. That was the object and purpose of framing the order, so that gentlemen who desired by any sort of motion to delay legislation would be prevented from having an opportunity to do it; and while the Chair thinks that of course the House must approve the Journal, yet the Chair decides that if the election case is called up the House must first vote upon that election case, and that other motions can not intervene so as to prevent the House from voting upon that question.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I simply desire to call the attention of the Chair, before the matter is closed, as to the suggestion of gentlemen making motions for the purposes of delay, that for my part I do not think that ought to be charged upon the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], whose motion we are now passing upon, and I do not think that he intended it for delay; but perhaps the Speaker does not regard the question of intention at all, but simply takes the result of the action of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman from Illinois has no apologies to make.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the substitute resolution.

Mr. LACEY. I appeal from the ruling of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to entertain the appeal. The Clerk will report the substitute resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Warren B. English was not legally elected to a seat in the Fifty-third Congress from the Third Congressional district of California, and is not entitled to a seat in this House.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays were ordered upon this resolution. As many as favor agreeing to the substitute resolution just read will, when their names are called, say aye, those opposed no.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 12, nays 167, not voting 174; as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call my name.

The name of the Speaker was called, and he voted nay.

The SPEAKER. On this question the yeas are 12; the nays 167; the nays have it, and the substitute is not agreed to. The Clerk will now report the resolutions reported from the majority of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Samuel G. Hilborn was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-third Congress from the Third Congressional district of California, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That Warren B. English was elected a Representative in the Fifty-third Congress from the Third Congressional district of California, and is entitled to a seat therein.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division of the propositions.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is not that such a motion as should not be entertained under this rule?

The SPEAKER. These are distinct substantive propositions.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. But the substance of the first resolution has virtually been passed upon just now by a vote of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the right to have a separate vote upon this resolution must exist. The Clerk will report the first resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Samuel G. Hilborn was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-third Congress from the Third Congressional district of California, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to this resolution.

Mr. BROWN. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 170, nays 13, not voting 169; as follows:

So the resolution was adopted.

During the roll call the following proceedings took place:

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the rule of the House be observed by the Clerk calling the name of a member but once and not repeating it in a manner that is a reprimand.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MONTGOMERY). The Clerk will proceed.

Mr. McMILLIN. There has been no ruling requiring the roll to be called in a manner different from the call which is now going on.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There is no rule which provides that the name of a member shall be but once called.

Mr. McMILLIN. No. There was some controversy on that point recently, but the Speaker did not rule that the call should be in any manner different from the call which is now being made. The ruling was that the roll should be called as had been customary, and the custom had been to call a name twice in some instances when the member's attention seemed to have been accidentally withdrawn.

Mr. BURROWS. I think the gentleman is in error about that.

Mr. McMILLIN. That was the ruling.

Mr. BURROWS. That was not the ruling.

The Clerk resumed, and completed the call, as above.

The SPEAKER. Upon this question the yeas are 165 and the nays are 17. The ayes have it, and the gentleman from California [Mr. English] will come forward and take the oath.

Mr. English then appeared at the bar of the House and was sworn in by the Speaker.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The question now is upon the approval of the Journal. The yeas and nays have been ordered upon ordering the previous question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent that the Journal be approved.

Mr. BURROWS. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan demands the regular order, which is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered on the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the previous question upon the approval of the Journal. Those who are in favor——

Mr. BURROWS. What is the motion before the House?

The SPEAKER. It is on ordering the previous question on the approval of the Journal.

Mr. BURROWS. On that the yeas and nays have been ordered?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent——

Mr. BURROWS. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon ordering the previous question on the approval of the Journal. Upon this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 179, nays 0, not voting 174; as follows:

So the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MONTGOMERY). The question now is on the approval of the Journal.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recognized.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. LACEY. To speak on this question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question has been ordered.

Mr. LACEY. But there has been no debate.

Mr. REED. We are entitled to debate—fifteen minutes on each side.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, it is an old adage among lawyers that "that which has never been done never ought to be done," and we may look absolutely in vain through all the parliamentary books for a ruling such as was made yesterday and is embodied in the Journal which we are now called upon to approve. The Speaker within the last few days has ruled both ways. On page 3338 of the RECORD certain proceedings relating to this matter appear. I made a motion to reconsider a vote, and the Speaker said he did not see why it was not in order. An objection was made. That motion to reconsider was held by the Chair to be in order. A motion was then made to adjourn, which motion was voted upon. Then someone renewed the point of order. The Speaker made the remark, "Is there any suggestion offered that the decision is wrong?" and then, upon a reconsideration of the matter, he ruled the other way. Now, sir, it seems to me that a question which is so doubtful that an eminent parliamentarian like the distinguished Speaker of this House decides it one way at the first blush, and upon second thought decides it another way, ought at least to be entitled to so much consideration as to be submitted to the House when an appeal is taken by a member of this body.

The appeal was made in good faith, not merely for delay, because the question involved the right of a member to his seat in this House, a seat to which beyond controversy he was elected. The majority report admitted that he was elected, but owing to the failure of some of the judges to properly indorse some of the ballots, those ballots, they reported, should be thrown out, and another man, who was not elected, should be counted in. In the report on the next case—the Hilborn case—the committee stated that the ballots were indorsed by the initials of the judges of election, and therefore should be thrown out. In other words, that one gentleman should be unseated because the ballots were not indorsed, and another unseated because they were indorsed. Now, an appeal upon a question like this ought to be submitted to the House, so that the Chair might have the satisfaction of having his ruling in a case of this kind passed upon by the action of this House.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all the time on this side. I think the ruling of the Chair was sufficiently understood yesterday, and there is no necessity for making any remarks now.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon approving the Journal.

The question being taken; there were on a division (called for by Mr. LACEY)—ayes 128, noes 1.

Mr. LACEY rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point, as the Chair understands, that no quorum has voted.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 183, nays 0, not voting 170; as follows:

BERING SEA AWARD.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I ask unanimous consent that the House take up for consideration now the bill (S. 1836) to give effect to the award rendered by the Tribunal of Arbitration at Paris under the treaty between the United States and Great Britain concerning the preservation of fur seals.

Mr. PAYNE. I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the regular order, which is equivalent to an objection.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I would like to make an explanation, if my friend from New York will allow me. This bill has passed the Senate unanimously, and it comes here——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands the regular order, and the Chair can not indulge discussion on the matter. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

The Clerk proceeded to call the committees.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. SAYERS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 6556) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS NIOBRARA RIVER.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reported back favorably the bill (S. 1403) to authorize the reconstruction of a bridge across Niobrara River, near the village of Niobrara, Nebr., and making appropriation therefor; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE HUDSON RIVER.

Mr. GEARY, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reported back the bill (H. R. 6448) to authorize the New York and New Jersey Bridge Companies to construct a bridge across the Hudson River between New York City and the State of New Jersey; which was referred to the House Calendar.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE COLUMBIA RIVER.

Mr. GEARY, also from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, reported back the bill (S. 1759) to amend an act entitled, "An act to authorize the Oregon and Washington Bridge Company to construct and maintain a bridge across the Columbia River between the State of Oregon and the State of Washington, and to establish it as a post-road:" which was referred to the House Calendar.

PROTECTION OF BIRDS AND ANIMALS, YELLOWSTONE PARK.

Mr. LACEY, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported back the bill (H. R. 6442) to protect the birds and animals in the Yellowstone National Park, to punish crimes in said park, and for other purposes; which was referred to the House Calendar.

ADVERSE REPORT.

Mr. SAYERS. In the absence of my colleague on the committee [Mr. DOCKERY] I desire to present another report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Adverse report on the concurrent resolution to increase the Capitol police force.

The SPEAKER. This resolution will lie on the table.

UNCOMPAHGRE AND UINTAH RESERVATIONS.

Mr. LYNCH, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. 6557) providing for the opening of the Uncompahgre and Uintah Indian Reservations in lieu of House bill 4511; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The bill (H. R. 4511) will lie on the table.

OTOE AND MISSOURIA INDIANS.

Mr. LYNCH, also from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. 5428) with an amendment to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the sale of the remainder of the reservation of the confederated Otoe and Missouria Indians in the States of Nebraska and Kansas, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1881; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 491) granting a pension to Alice K. Potter, widow of Gen. Joseph H. Potter, deceased;

A bill (S. 655) to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in the District of Columbia, and to regulate the proceedings before them: and

A bill (S. 1846) to give effect to the award rendered by the Tribunal of Arbitration at Paris, under the treaty between the United States and Great Britain concluded at Washington, February 29, 1892, for the purpose of submitting to arbitration certain questions concerning the preservation of the fur seals.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendment, the bill (H. R. 3246) for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate further insists upon its amendment to the bill (H. R. 3606) to require railroad companies operating railroads in the Territories over a right of way granted by the Government to establish stations and depots at all town sites on the lines of railroads established by the Interior Department disagreed to by the House of Representatives, asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. BERRY, Mr. BLACKBURN, and Mr. PETTIGREW as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

COINAGE OF THE SEIGNIORAGE.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration the seigniorage bill and move that it pass, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

Mr. SICKLES. I raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be first reported.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4956) directing the coinage of the silver bullion held in the Treasury, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately cause to be coined as fast as possible the silver bullion held in the Treasury, purchased under the act of July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issuing of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," to the amount of the gain or seigniorage of such bullion, to wit: The sum of $55,156,081, and such coin or the silver certificates issued thereon shall be used in the payment of public expenditures, and the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, if the needs of the Treasury demand it, issue silver certificates in excess of such coinage: Provided, That said excess shall not exceed the amount of the seigniorage as herein authorized to be coined.

SEC. 2. After the coinage provided for in the first section of this act, the remainder of the silver bullion purchased in pursuance of said act of July 14, 1890, shall be coined into legal-tender standard silver dollars as fast as possible, and the coin shall be held in the Treasury for the redemption of the Treasury notes issued in the purchase of said bullion. That as fast as the bullion shall be coined for the redemption of said notes, the notes shall not be reissued but shall be canceled and destroyed in amounts equal to the coin held at any time in the Treasury, derived from the coinage herein provided for, and silver certificates shall be issued on such coin in the manner now provided by law: Provided, That this act shall not be construed to change existing law relating to the legal-tender character or mode of redemption of the Treasury notes issued under said act of July 14, 1890.

SEC. 3. That a sufficient sum of money is hereby appropriated to carry into effect the provisions of this act.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York raises the question of consideration.

Mr. BAILEY. I submit the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the question of consideration can not be raised against a bill in this condition, for the reason that the Constitution requires the House to proceed to reconsider it.

Mr. SICKLES. But it does not prescribe any time when it shall be considered.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, if the question of consideration could be raised now it could be repeated every time the bill is called up, and thus a rule of the House might defeat the plain mandate of the Constitution.

Mr. SICKLES. The question of consideration may be raised at any time on any question or any motion pending before the House. I refer the Chair to Rule XVI, which permits that question to be raised now.

The SPEAKER. There does not seem to have been, so far as the Chair has been able to ascertain by hasty examination of the Journal as to Executive vetoes, any question of consideration raised or any ruling upon that point. The Chair finds that in every instance to which its attention has been referred the House either proceeded to consider or voted to postpone the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SICKLES. If it is competent for the House to postpone the consideration, then it is, of course, competent for the House to say that it will not consider it now.

The SPEAKER. But the trouble is in the language of the Constitution, to which the Chair calls attention:

Every bill which shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall, before it becomes a law, be presented to the President of the United States. If he approve he shall sign it, but if not he shall return it, with his objections, to that House in which it shall have originated, who shall enter the objections at large on their Journal, and proceed to reconsider it.

That is the language of the Constitution.

Mr. SICKLES. But whether the House will proceed to reconsider it now or at some specified time is for the House itself to determine. The Constitution does not prescribe that it shall be done at a specific time. It is for the House to say when it will do so. Now, if it is competent for the House to postpone consideration of a vetoed bill, as it has done in the case of the present bill, it is competent also for the House to determine whether it will consider it now or at some future time. It is always competent, and must be, for the House to determine whether it will now consider a question or will consider it to-morrow, or on some future day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will bear in mind that a postponement is a form of consideration.

Mr. SICKLES. Precisely. And this is equivalent to a motion to postpone.

The SPEAKER. But the point the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] makes, is that the question of consideration can not be raised.

Mr. SICKLES. The question of consideration only raises the question whether it shall be considered now. The House may vote with me to-day on that proposition, but they may nevertheless consider the bill to-morrow, or at some other time. I do not move the indefinite postponement of the subject. I do not think that would be consistent with the Constitution. I do not move to lay the bill on the table. I simply raise the question whether the House will now consider it, and this is allowed by the rules of the House. No precedent is cited against me.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the language of the Constitution is very explicit, that the House shall proceed to the consideration of this measure. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SICKLES] can accomplish his purpose just as well, if he desires to postpone the consideration, by making a motion in that form; but it seems to me that he can not raise the question of consideration. He may make a motion to postpone the consideration, and reach his object in that way.

Mr. SICKLES. If it is obligatory on the House to consider the question at once, then it was obligatory on the House to consider it as soon as the veto message was read. That was not done. The House proceeded to the consideration of other business, and it is just as much in order now to proceed to the consideration of other business as it was then.

Mr. ENLOE. There was a special order then.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to remind the Chair that a few days ago I brought up the constitutional provision which required the House to proceed to reconsider this bill; and if the Speaker remembers, he ruled against that question of privilege on the ground that a certain special rule of the House would intervene; that the order under which we were then acting, the report of the Committee on Rules, took precedence of, or rather, as I understood it, put in abeyance the constitutional provision. Now, it seems to me that if the order of business under which we were then acting, which was simply a rule adopted by the House, could be interposed against the constitutional requirement, then this rule of the House, which admits of the raising of the question of consideration, might also be interposed, while, of course, I believe that neither of them could properly be.

Mr. ENLOE. Mr. Speaker, in reply to what the gentleman says, I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the House was then considering a privileged matter, the question of the right of a member to his seat, a question of the highest privilege, and was considering it under a special order of the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE. But it would take a long time for the gentleman and myself to discuss the relative privilege under the rulings in this Congress of the proposition to proceed under a constitutional requirement to reconsider an Executive veto and another question of high privilege.

Mr. ENLOE. It might take some time for us to agree about it, but it seems to me that to the ordinary mind there would be no difficulty in determining that the first question to be considered, as a matter of privilege, is the right of a member of the House to his seat.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, at the time indicated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SICKLES] there was another question of higher privilege than the veto message pending. Therefore it was incumbent upon the House to complete the order upon which it was engaged, which was of a higher privilege than this; but when we have reached the question of the consideration of this measure, which is provided for under the Constitution, it seems to me that it can only be displaced in one of two ways: First, by a question of higher privilege, which does not now come before the House; and, secondly, by a motion to postpone its consideration, or to commit, or to put the question upon the passage of the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding.

We are guided in this case by a rule fixed in the Constitution, not by our own rule which is to this effect, that when we do reach the place where it is in order to consider it, it must then be considered; and consideration means that one member can not move that we do not consider it, but that we take up something else. If there were a question of equally high privilege pending, it might determine the question as to which should be considered, but there is no such question now pending, and therefore this question before us demands the consideration of the House, its consideration being provided for by the Constitution. It seems to me that it can only be disposed of by a motion that amounts to consideration, and a motion that prohibits consideration would not be in order.

Mr. SICKLES. If the Constitution makes this a privileged question, then it is a question of the highest privilege, and this House can not put any question above it, because it can not supersede the Constitution. Now this House has regarded this as an ordinary question, and not as a privileged question. The House gave precedence over it to a privileged question, and if it has done it once it can do it again.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to decide. The Chair has not been able to find, by a hurried examination of the precedents, that there has been at any time a question of consideration raised against a veto message. The Constitution of the United States declares that the message shall be sent to the House in which the bill originated, which House shall proceed to reconsider the bill. The present message was sent to the House a few days ago, at which time the House had under consideration a contested-election case, and was operating under a rule which might fairly be held to postpone the consideration of any other question until that question had been disposed of. Undoubtedly the House would have the right, as has been the precedent, to postpone the consideration of a veto message, although the question of consideration might not be raised.

Postponement is itself consideration; and it may be fairly held that the order adopted by the House, under which they were considering the contested-election case, was a postponement of any question that might come in to interfere with the measure until the House had fully disposed of it. Treating it in that way, it is regarded as a postponement of this veto message until that order had exhausted itself. The order has now exhausted itself; the message is before the House. The Constitution says the House must proceed to consider it; the House the other day ordered a postponement until that order was exhausted, and that time has come. Therefore, the Chair holds that the question of consideration can not now be raised.

Mr. BOUTELLE. How could there be any postponement of consideration before the message was written or sent in to the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has heretofore, on occasions when he has made a decision, held that no gentleman had the right to ask for any other and further reasons than those stated.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I suppose that is a later innovation?

The SPEAKER. That is one of the rulings that has been made to resent what the Chair regards as impertinence. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Missouri——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker [loud cries of "Sit down!" on the Democratic side], I hope the Chair will incorporate these new inhibitions that he has established as to the rights of members in the printed rules, so that we may know what our rights are now held to be.

[Great confusion in the Hall.]

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, as soon as I can have order I would like to state that on Saturday at 3 o'clock I shall demand the previous question on the motion, hoping that if that is not satisfactory to the gentlemen in opposition some agreement may now be made. [Very loud cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, in behalf of the minority members of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, I would say that [cries of "Vote!"] so far as the Democratic members who are in favor of sustaining the veto message are concerned, we would like to take the vote immediately; but I am not satisfied that that will be acceptable to the minority members, who are the Republicans, on that committee. I would like to hear the views of the gentleman who made the minority report [Mr. CHARLES W. STONE of Pennsylvania].

Mr. BLAND. I have no objection to taking the vote now. [Renewed cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Speaker, so far as I am advised——

Mr. TRACEY. So far as I am concerned, it would be very agreeable to me to take the vote at once. [Applause.]

Mr. COCKRAN. That is right.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. The House will probably remember that on the discussion of this bill the disposition was such that even the members of the committee were prevented from expressing their views upon it. Some of the members of the committee were absent, and I am unwilling at this time to make any agreement that would result in preventing them from having an opportunity to express their views.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration pass the bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding? On this the Constitution requires that the yeas and nays be entered upon the Journal. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. ABBOTT.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the Chair proposes immediately to have the roll called without debate?

The SPEAKER. No gentleman desired it. The Chair can not interrupt the call of the roll.

Mr. TRACEY. A parliamentary inquiry——

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. TRACEY. If the Chair will permit—those members who desire to sustain the veto of the President will, then, vote "no," as I understand it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not interrupt the roll call.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not interrupt the roll call. The first name has been called, and the Clerk will call the roll. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The Clerk proceeded with the call.

During the roll call the following proceedings took place:

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURROWS. This is a very important matter, and it is impossible to hear the Clerk call the roll, owing to the disorder.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, there was so much confusion at the time the Chair stated the question that a great many gentlemen do not understand what is the question before the House. It ought to be stated again. I presume that is the reason——

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration agree to pass this bill, the objections of the President to the contrary notwithstanding?

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, my colleague [Mr. DINGLEY] was ready to address the House upon this question before the roll call began.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman [Mr. DINGLEY] made no such statement until after the first name on the roll had been called. [Cries of "Regular order!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REED. The reason why he did not was because the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] was entitled to the floor. I submit to the Speaker and to the House that this is not suitable, because my colleague was ready to address the Chair, and if he did not do so it was because, in the confusion, the first name on the roll was called before an opportunity was afforded to the House to know what the situation was. [Cries of "Regular order!"] The discussion that was going on was in reference to an arrangement for time for debate, and before anybody had an opportunity to understand what the situation was the first name was called. [Renewed cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER. The House will bear the circumstances in mind. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] was recognized, whereupon some suggestion was made as to an agreement between that gentleman and the gentleman from New York [Mr. TRACEY], who called upon the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHARLES W. STONE], one of his colleagues in the minority on the committee. There was a general call throughout the House of "Vote!" "Vote!" whereupon, the agreement failing, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] stated that he was willing to have the vote taken now, and no gentleman rose to address the Chair.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BURROWS. Will the Chair listen——

The SPEAKER (continuing). The Chair stated the question, and stated that under the Constitution the yeas and nays must be entered upon the Journal. Still no gentleman rose to address the Chair. The Chair then directed the Clerk to call the roll, and the first name was called, and then, for the first time, the Chair had any intimation that the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] desired to address the House.

Mr. DINGLEY. A single statement in this connection, Mr. Speaker. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. DINGLEY. An arrangement was made between the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND] and myself. He was to open the debate and I supposed that it was——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. I make the point that gentlemen can not interrupt the roll call. [Confusion in the Hall.]

Mr. REED. I want the Speaker to understand this matter. My colleague states——

The SPEAKER. The Speaker does understand it, and the Speaker directs the Clerk to resume the call of the roll. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, my colleague——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not allow the roll call to be interrupted.

Mr. REED. My colleague states, Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not interrupt the roll call.

Mr. REED. I think the Speaker has not heard my colleague's statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will take his seat.

Mr. REED. Certainly I will.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will take his seat. All gentlemen will be seated. Nothing will be accomplished by this persistence.

Mr. REED. There is no resistance, Mr. Speaker, but——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will take his seat and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. REED sat down, but immediately rose again and said: Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask to be heard.

The SPEAKER. The Chair declines to hear the gentleman. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must not interrupt the roll call.

Mr. REED. Will the Speaker hear a word?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not.

Mr. REED. My colleague states——

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not hear the gentleman. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I shall decline to cast my vote in such a condition of confusion as this.

The Clerk proceeded with the call.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not interrupt the roll call.

Mr. BURROWS. I rise to a question of order. Nobody can hear, owing to the confusion.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Tyranny! Tyranny!

The SPEAKER. Until order is restored public business can not be transacted. Members can not hear their names when they are called. The House will be in order.

Mr. TRACEY. Mr. Speaker, I think unanimous consent should be given—the House should understand—it is not proper——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will take his seat. The Chair will hear nothing. The roll call has been entered upon and must be concluded. The House will be in order and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Speaker can not have heard my colleague——

The SPEAKER. The Chair has twice said to the gentleman from Maine that he declines to permit the roll call to be interrupted. If the gentleman persists in this violation of the rule as determined by the Chair, the Chair can only appeal to the fairness and justice of the House.

Mr. REED. Will the Chair permit me?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not permit the gentleman to interrupt the roll call. The Chair hopes the gentleman will understand that. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the call of the roll. The question being taken, there were—yeas 144, nays 114, not voting 95; as follows:

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be indefinitely postponed.

PROCEEDINGS OF PAN-AMERICAN MEDICAL CONGRESS.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound in cloth, of the proceedings of the Pan-American Medical Congress, held in Washington City, in September, 1893, under the authority of a joint resolution of Congress approved July 18, 1892, 10,000 copies; of which 2,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 4,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 4,000 for distribution by the Department of State, the same to be indexed under the direction of the Committee on Printing.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 1860) to authorize Prof. Asaph Hall, of the United States Navy, to accept a gold medal from the Academy of Science of France; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PETTIGREW introduced a bill (S. 1865) for the relief of certain Pottawatomie Indians, of Michigan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PROPOSED REDUCTION OF OFFICIAL INCOMES.

Mr. GEORGE. I submit the following resolution, and ask its reference to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved, That in view of the present depressed financial condition of the people, the low price of agricultural and other products, the indebtedness of many of the people, and the increased value of money, the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to prepare and report to the Senate a bill reducing 20 per cent all official incomes payable out of the Treasury of the United States not protected from reduction by the Constitution of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, if there be no objection.

Mr. PLATT. Why should it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary? I have no special objection to make to its reference to that committee, but it seems to me it would be more appropriate to refer it to the Finance Committee. I know the Senator from Mississippi is upon the Judiciary Committee, and I shall not object to a reference of the resolution to that committee if he desires it to go there.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire the resolution to go to the Judiciary Committee, because I think that is the appropriate committee to consider it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so referred, in the absence of objection.

PROPOSED REPEAL OF BOND PROVISION.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit a resolution, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1457) to repeal a part of section 3 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments, approved January 14, 1875, and for other purposes," be, and is hereby, discharged from the further consideration thereof, and said bill is ordered to be placed on the Calendar for consideration by the Senate in its regular order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the resolution had better go over. I do not see present any member of the Committee on Finance upon the other side of the Chamber.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMITTEE HEARINGS.

Mr. GORMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Committee on Interstate Commerce 700 copies of all hearings had before said committee during the year 1893, and during each year subsequent thereto, including the hearings had during the present session of Congress.

THE REVENUE BILL.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that if it is agreeable to the Senate, on Monday next at 2 o'clock I will submit some remarks on the subject of the pending tariff legislation.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, communicated to the Senate resolutions passed by the House commemorative of the life and services of Hon. Charles O'Neill, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. Res. 139) to print the Agricultural Report for 1893; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

ISSUE OF BONDS.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PEFFER March 28, 1894, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and it is hereby, instructed to prepare and report as soon as practicable a bill to repeal all laws authorizing or permitting the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds or other interest-bearing obligations of the Government, and to prohibit any and all such issues in the future without express authority by act of Congress first had and obtained.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President——

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask the Senator from Kansas if he will not be kind enough to yield until I make a request for unanimous consent to take up a Senate bill.

Mr. PEFFER. I have no objection to complying with the request of the Senator from North Dakota provided the resolution goes over and retains its place.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope that order will be made and that the resolution will retain its place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE RUSSIAN THISTLE.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 1545) to provide for the destruction and extermination of the noxious plant or weed known as Russian thistle or Russian cactus, technically Salsola kali tragus.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] has an amendment which he desires to offer to the bill. I do not see him in the Chamber. I will object until the Senator from South Dakota is present.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will withdraw the objection. The Senator from South Dakota was in the Chamber a few moments ago. I see the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS] in his seat, and I understand he desires to be heard on the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well; if the Senator from Texas desires to occupy the floor I withdraw my objection. I can send for the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator from North Dakota does not object, I will with his consent move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. I wish to have a short executive session.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I hope the Senator from Texas will be permitted to address the Senate on the bill.

Mr. MILLS. I care very little about talking on it. I should like to accommodate my friend from Florida for a little while; if he wants the Senate to go into executive session I will give way entirely.

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from North Dakota will not object.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I trust the Senator from Florida will allow us to proceed with the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, the objection that I have to the present bill is that it does not appear before the proper government that has charge of the matter submitted by the bill. I know the bill is in the line with other measures which have been adopted by Congress in invading the territorial jurisdiction of the local sovereignties and taking upon the Federal Government the discharge of duties which have been reserved by the compacts of the Constitution to the several States. I think it is a fundamental truth, at the bottom of our whole system of Government, that the best possible government over any people is that which is most closely within the control of each separate locality. It is upon that principle that our complicated system of Government was founded by our fathers.

The Government of the United States was established by its founders for the purpose of regulating affairs between the whole body of our people and foreign people and the concerns of the several States, being international and interstate in its operation. Here comes a measure proposing to Congress that it shall go into a State of the Union and regulate the digging up of weeds, extirpating grasses and noxious growths, directing how farms are to be tilled, what improvements are to be made, and taking upon the National Government and the people who support it by a national system of taxation all the expenditures that are necessary to clear the farms of individual farmers in the several States of the Russian thistle, crab grass, foxtail, cactus, and all of the things that hinder the cultivation of the soil.

I have simply taken the floor, Mr. President, to recall this body (not so much our friends on the other side as our friends on this side) back to the old truths of our fathers. My friend on the other side yesterday rather taunted us with Jeffersonian Democracy, and I come to talk a little more Jeffersonian Democracy, or to permit Mr. Jefferson himself to talk to us, who claim to be the disciples and followers of him, and to those who believe in the principles which he taught, the party that for a hundred years has walked in the precepts and the faith of Mr. Jefferson. In discussing some of these collateral questions in his seventy-seventh year, in his autobiography, in speaking of a decision, I believe, of the Supreme Court of the United States, which in his judgment had assumed legislative functions instead of judicial, he says:

> We have seen too that, contrary, to all correct example, they are in the habit of going out of the question before them, to throw an anchor ahead, and grapple further hold for future advances of power.

That is what legislatian has been doing. Jefferson dreaded the encroachments of the two departments of the Government, the judiciary and the legislative. In all foreign governments the dread had been of the encroachments of the executive upon the liberties and rights of its people; but he foretold, with the correctness of a prophet of the ancient days, that the rights and the liberties of the people of this country would be invaded by the judiciary and by the legislative departments of the Government, and that they would do it by throwing out anchors and catching hold and pulling up, and, as he said, making a violation of one right a precedent for the violation of another. Now, listen:

> They are then, in fact, the corps of sappers and miners, steadily working to undermine the independent rights of the States, and to consolidate all power in the hands of that Government in which they have so important a freehold estate.

Now, he lays down a principle:

> But it is not by the consolidation or concentration of powers, but by their distribution, that good government is effected. Were not this great country already divided into States, that division must be made, that each might do for itself what concerns itself directly, and what it can so much better do than a distant authority. Every State again is divided into counties, each to take care of what lies within its local bounds; each county again into townships or wards, to manage minuter details; and every ward into farms, to be governed each by its individual proprietor.

Not by Congress, but in the subdivision of power it goes down and down until each farm is governed by its owner. Let him dig up his Russian thistle, and not come to Congress to have Congress direct how he is to dig his thistles and at what time of the year he is to dig his thistles, and assume the burden of the expense.

I call the attention of my friends to this:

> Were we directed from Washington when to sow and when to reap, we should soon want bread. It is by this partition of cares, descending in gradation from general to particular, that the mass of human affairs may be best managed for the good and prosperity of all.

That is Democracy; that is the gospel in which we have been taught; and I ask my Democratic friends on this side of the Chamber where do they find a resting place in the Constitution of this Government, by appropriation or otherwise, to invade the territorial jurisdiction of a State and assume to control the internal concerns of its people?

They come now with an appropriation of a million dollars. Yes, Mr. President, that is the Greeks coming bearing gifts. It is a million dollars to be given to the people for the privilege of breaking down their constitutional rights to take care of their own liberties. A million dollars is the prize offered to tempt the people to accept this infringement of State authority; but when they get inside of the gates, then it is a Trojan horse. After a while the effort will be made to regulate your elections, to regulate the succession and descent and distribution of property, to regulate your taxation, and to do everything else that Congress or the party in power may wish to do.

I received, sir, a printed pamphlet the other day, some new paper established for the purpose of inculcating a new idea, in which it is boldly taught that State lines ought to be abolished; that there should be but one legislative assembly in this whole country, and that should be here in Washington, and that this legislature should legislate for everything in which the whole 65,000,000 American people are interested. We are going along on that line. If we go on in that line, if we continue to follow it, we shall be running over all the landmarks and all the principles our fathers have laid down as absolutely essential to the preservation of the liberties of the people.

Again, I will call attention to what the same great founder said in 1816. He was talking about schools. He believed in local self-government in schools; he believed that the ward republic, as he termed the little district, understood how to build up schools, and would do it better and would control them better than the schools would be controlled by the whole State; and I believe Mr. Jefferson is correct in that, for we have schools of that sort in my own State, where we control them in our own towns, levy our own taxation, build up our own schoolhouses, and select our own teachers, and they are the pride of each locality, and are the very best schools we have in the State.

> But if it is believed that these elementary schools will be better managed by the governor and council, the commissioners of the literary fund, or any other general authority of the Government, than by the parents within each ward, it is a belief against all experience. Try the principle one step further, and amend the bill so as to commit to the governor and council the management of all our farms, our mills, and merchants' stores. No, my friend, the way to have good and safe government is not to trust it all to one, but to divide it among the many, distributing to everyone exactly the functions he is competent to. Let the National Government be intrusted with the defense of the nation, and its foreign and Federal relations; the State governments with the civil rights, laws, police, and administration of what concerns the State generally; the counties with the local concerns of the counties, and each ward direct the interests within itself.
> It is by dividing and subdividing these republics from the great national one down through all its subordinations, until it ends in the administration of every man's farm by himself; by placing under everyone what his own eye may superintend, that all will be done for the best. What has destroyed liberty and the rights of man in every government which has ever existed under the sun? The generalizing and concentrating all cares and powers into one body, no matter whether of the autocrats of Russia or France, or of the aristocrats of a Venetian senate. And I do believe that if the Almighty has not decreed that man shall never be free (and it is a blasphemy to believe it), that the secret will be found to be in the making himself the depository of the powers respecting himself, so far as he is competent to them, and delegating only what is beyond his competence by a synthetical process, to higher and higher orders of functionaries, so as to trust fewer and fewer powers in proportion as the trustees become more and more oligarchical. The elementary republics of the wards, the county republics, the State republics, and the Republic of the Union, would form a gradation of authorities, standing each on the basis of law, holding every one its delegated share of powers, and constituting truly a system of fundamental balances and checks for the Government.

This is the doctrine which I wish to recall to our friends on this side of the Chamber, that we have no right to make a law to regulate the Russian thistle in any State of the Union. If the Russian thistle comes to the District of Columbia, under the Constitution we are empowered to exterminate it or to exterminate any other foe here, but beyond the boundaries of the District of Columbia we have no power to go.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to make any extended remarks this morning upon the pending bill or to discuss its constitutionality. I recognize the objection raised by the Senators on this side of the Chamber to the bill, and therefore I will move the amendments which I now send to the Secretary's desk to be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the amendments intended to be proposed by Mr. KYLE, as follows:

Strike out all of section 1, after "make," in line 17, page 2, and insert the following:

"As fair an estimate as practicable of the total cost of exterminating said thistle in each of the States in which it exists. He shall, thereupon, divide the sum hereinafter appropriated among said States in the proportion that the cost of exterminating said thistle in each shall bear to the aggregate cost of such extermination in all the States."

Strike out section 2, and insert the following:

"SEC. 2. That the sum of $1,000,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying out this act, and the same shall be paid out of the Treasury to the Secretary of Agriculture on warrants made by him."

Strike out section 3, and insert the following:

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall, after deducting the expenses to be incurred on account of the agents provided for in the first section of this act, pay the remainder of said sum of $1,000,000 to the governors of the several States in which said thistle is found to exist, in the proportion hereinbefore provided for, taking from each of said governors an obligation in writing that the sum received by him will be expended in connection with any other sum or sums which may be provided in his State, either by taxation or voluntary contribution, for that purpose in exterminating said thistle in his State. If any governor shall refuse to execute said obligation, then the quota of his State shall be covered into the Treasury."

Mr. KYLE. Mr. President, personally I believe it is competent for Congress to legislate upon all matters of public concern. I do not think there can be any question in regard to that. It has been the practice of Congress in cases preceding this, when cholera and other contagious diseases have approached the shores of the United States, to make appropriations for the purpose of stamping them out. A short time ago, when pleuro-pneumonia made its appearance, a law very similar to that now proposed was enacted and put into operation.

I do not see the parallel between the bill before us and the teachings from the works of Jefferson read by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], who has just preceded me; but to avoid the difficulty which may arise before us now in regard to this question I have prepared this amendment. It does not provide that the Government shall send its officers into the various States of the Union to dig up the Russian thistle or other noxious weeds; but that the money shall be appropriated outright from the United States Treasury to the States, to be used by the governors as they or the State Legislatures may direct.

Whether it be constitutional or not to operate in the States in the way indicated by the Senator from Texas, I believe in this instance it is the duty of the United States Government to cooperate with the States interested in stamping out the Russian thistle, which has become a matter of public concern in a large section of the Mississippi Valley.

The Russian thistle was brought to this country only about fifteen or twenty years ago, and first appeared in the city of Yankton, in my State. It has spread since that time as far south as Kansas, as far north as the British possessions, as far west as Montana, and as far east as Wisconsin, covering, I believe, about seven or eight States.

As to the duty of the Government to coöperate in extirpating this noxious weed, I have this to say: If we, by State legislation, should attempt to extirpate the thistle, we should be confronted with the difficulty that in the several States named the United States holds a very large acreage of public lands. Were this weed removed, therefore, from the cultivated farms, it would immediately appear upon the public lands.

Let me give you the acreage of public and private lands of the States interested. The State of North Dakota has 45,561,600 acres of land, of which the United States Government holds at the present time 19,590,555 acres, nearly half the land in the State.

South Dakota has 50,643,200 acres, of which the Government holds 13,003,396 acres, a little more than a quarter of the whole. Nebraska has 49,077,359 acres, of which the Government holds 10,799,332 acres, nearly a fourth. The State of Iowa has 35,228,800 acres; the United States Government holds none. The State of Minnesota has 53,459,840 acres, of which the Government still holds 6,510,611 acres. Montana has 92,016,640 acres, of which the Government holds 74,558,143 acres, more than three-fourths of the amount being public land. Wisconsin has 34,511,360 acres, of which the Government holds 871,087. The total acreage in these States is thus shown to be 370,498,799, of which 125,246,124 acres belong to the United States.

Mr. President, this has become an important question for us in the West. This weed is not like the foxtail and crab grass, as stated by the Senator from Texas. It is entirely different. It is not like the measles and the whooping cough, mentioned by some Senator, as compared with other contagious diseases. It is as different from foxtail and crab grass as the measles and the whooping cough are different from Asiatic cholera.

The Russian thistle is peculiarly of the noxious class. It grows from a single small tap root, and on coming up looks no more destructive than a spear of asparagus; but it begins to branch out in boll shape until it is 2 or 3 feet in diameter at the top. It becomes woody, and then thorny. By and by the root becomes loosened, and the weed goes tumbling over the prairies for a distance of 20 miles, scattering its seed on every side.

There are in the State of South Dakota, where I live, whole farms, of which every acre was cultivated a few years ago, and from which abundant crops of wheat were raised, which have been abandoned in consequence of this weed. The same is true of North Dakota; and it is a serious question as to how we are going to eradicate the evil.

As I stated a moment ago, suppose we should extirpate the weed from cultivated farms, the seeds become scattered over the public lands, and they take root on every sandy molehill, where they grow, and are carried back again upon private lands.

The Government, therefore, is obliged to this extent—certainly morally, if not legally—of removing the weed from the public lands; and hence an appropriation should be made for the purpose of coöperating with the States.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I will ask the Senator how this weed, which he describes so graphically, ever obtained a foothold? Is it indigenous to the soil?

Mr. KYLE. I will answer the Senator by saying that the seed was brought here by virtue of the immigration laws established by Congress. As stated before the Senator came in, citizens of my State who came from Russia some years ago brought the seed with their goods, or in some other way. It obtained a foothold in Yankton, S. D., and has spread within fifteen years over about seven States.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Why was the weed permitted to spread by the people who own the farms which the Senator declares are so valuable? Why did the farmers in that section of country permit this weed, so destructive in its nature and character, to spread over such an area of territory that to-day the Government of the United States is called upon to suppress it?

Mr. KYLE. I presume the reason may be explained in this way. Nobody at first seemed to pay any attention to it; it was a new weed; they knew nothing of it, and almost before we were able to discover what it was, it had spread over the States named.

I have already explained how the seed is scattered over the country. A weed, when it is grown and the seed has ripened, becomes loosened at the roots and goes tumbling across the prairies, scattering the seed for 15 or 20 miles, so that in a single year a section that did not have a weed before becomes entirely covered so as to render the land valueless.

I think, therefore, Mr. President, the amendment I have offered provides the best solution of the question. Under it there will be distributed in the neighborhood of $200,000 to the States affected, which will be placed in the hands of the governor. He can then coöperate with the State authorities in stamping out the noxious weed. The sum is not too large. At the same time the amendment removes the objection raised by the Senator from Texas and other Senators on this side of the Chamber in regard to the constitutionality of the measure.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, the report of the committee accompanying this bill shows briefly these historical facts. In speaking of the Russian thistle the committee say:

> In them we find that the Russian thistle was transplanted to the United States by Russian immigrants who came here under the provisions of our national immigration laws. The seed was brought from Russia about 1878 in some black flaxseed which was sown and the plant was first discovered to be growing upon our soil about 1880, in the southern portion of South Dakota. From there it has spread, according to official reports, over an area of 70,000 square miles, covering two-thirds of the grain-growing regions of South Dakota, almost one-third of the arable land of North Dakota, and it is to be found in many parts of Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, Nebraska, and Wyoming.

On page 2 of the report I read:

> The Russian thistle is like no other pest which has in the past threatened the material interests of our institutions. The danger to agriculture from its ravages is now far greater than were the dangers to the live-stock interests of the country from pleuro-pneumonia in 1884. In that year Congress enacted a law establishing a Bureau of Animal Industry, making it a part of the Department of Agriculture and empowering the Department, through the Bureau, to make a campaign against the malignant disease then decimating our cattle herds. As a result, pleuro-pneumonia has been completely extirpated in the United States. The expense of the work of extirpating pleuro-pneumonia has been twice as great as the amount now asked by your committee to exterminate the Russian thistle, but it is conceded by all that the expenditure was a most economical one.

I read these extracts from the report of the committee for the purpose of showing the ravages the Russian thistle is making in the agricultural lands of this country. That there is a necessity for some action upon the part of the Federal and the State governments to extirpate this weed it seems to me but few, if any, will deny. The only objection made to such action by the Senator from Texas goes to the constitutional power of the Government to take charge of this matter and eradicate this weed from the agricultural lands of the Missouri Valley. The Senator from Texas, in my judgment, is wrong in his construction of the Constitution so far as the power of Congress is concerned in this respect.

I agree with much that was said by the Senator from Texas. I agree with him in the necessity of preserving distinctly the line of demarcation between the powers of the nation and the State governments. This line must be preserved.

But every similitude in the history of this country, the entire practice of the Government, so far as I am informed, from which deductions are to be drawn in support of this measure, are in favor of the existence of the power of the General Government to deal with this question and employ its men and means in extirpating this noxious, foreign, and destructive weed.

The weed, it must be remembered by Senators, is not indigenous. It is not something that was found in this country when the State and National Governments were established. It is a weed that has come to our shores as a public enemy, coming in disguise. It is a weed that threatens the life of our agriculture; and, in my judgment, the Congress of the United States not only has the power under the Constitution, but it becomes its duty to protect the agricultural interests and agricultural lands against the invasion of this public enemy by the means provided in this bill as well as any other public enemy.

Suppose, in answering the argument of the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], that by some means a person, a foreign immigrant who under our law is prohibited from coming into this country and finding lodgment here, should slip across the line and come within the territory of the United States in violation of the law; would the Senator from Texas say that the moment he got across the line and located in some particular State the jurisdiction of the General Government ceased and the jurisdiction of the State government alone attached to him? Suppose a foreign enemy with flags and with munitions of war was assailing some portion of our country, and by secrecy should find lodgment in the State of Texas; would have passed from the common seas into our territory and into the territory of the State of Texas before being discovered, would the Senator from Texas claim, would he for a minute claim that this Government would be powerless to take the matter in hand and drive from our shores an enemy of that kind simply because through secrecy he had crossed the line of some particular State? If he was a public enemy before he landed, if he threatened the integrity and sovereignty of this nation, whether upon land or upon sea, it would be a subject over which this Government would have complete jurisdiction and with which it would be compelled to deal.

Suppose again, that articles of merchandise are smuggled into this country, we will say across the Canadian line, across our Northern border, in violation of the revenue laws of the country. I suppose the Senator from Texas would say that if we knew the smuggler was coming across the line, and could meet him at the line between this country and Canada, the General Government would have power to prevent his coming, but if by cunning or art he should cross the line with the prohibited articles, the moment he would cross the line the General Government would be powerless to deal with him or the articles he had imported in violation of our statute. If the General Government has power to enact a law to prevent the importation of certain articles or to prevent their importation unless certain duties are paid, and that law is violated by smuggling, the Government has power likewise to follow the smuggler and the goods he smuggles from Maine to Texas if need be. That was the decision of our Supreme Court early, in the Maryland case, and it has been the law from that time to this moment.

It may be said that this is not a general subject with which the General Government is to deal in the sense of the Constitution, but does not the preservation of our agriculture lie at the very foundation of our Government? If anything threatens the life or the health of our people, such for instance as cholera, or if any foreign disease threatens invasion of this country, we all admit the power and the duty of the Government to meet and suppress it. Suppose that cholera, for instance, should cross into this country, should be brought to some of our ports, and by some process should be carried into the interior of the country, would any Senator stand here to say that this Government would not have power to follow and extirpate it because it had located in some particular State?

Mr. President, the same law which aims at keeping from our country the invasion of disease, the preservation of the health of our people, the same law of self-preservation and self-defense inherent in every government, that gives us power to meet a common enemy at the border of our country and repel him, and a power that is implied in this Government as much as it is in a natural individual, gives us not only the power to meet this foreign enemy in the form of a formidable weed that threatens the destruction of our agriculture, but it gives us power to follow that weed wherever it goes in this country and destroy it in the interest of our agriculture. No one disputes the fact that this Government may by proper appropriation, aid the carrying commerce of the nation. We have power to grant subsidies, to encourage the carrying of our products across the ocean, and encourage the building of ships. Is it true that we may expend money in this respect; is it true that we may expend money in the construction of railroads and other enterprises of that kind for the convenience of commerce and the benefit of our people, and yet when a seed or a plant is brought from a foreign country by stealth or by accident, which threatens to overrun and destroy a great portion of our country, it is said that we are powerless under the Constitution to meet and destroy it? I have no faith in the constitutional position of my friend from Texas on this question.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I believe it to be my duty to say something about the amendments proposed and about the bill generally. I have given some attention in the last few days to the subject of the Russian thistle. I find that it is a most terrible pest. I find that it is of that peculiar nature where a man owning a farm can not eradicate it on that land unless it also be eradicated on the neighboring lands. It is a very singular weed. That the Senate may understand it fully, I propose to make some statements upon the subject.

When it is very young, probably for two months after it comes up in the spring of the year—it is an annual—the weed is a very fine pasturage. I have before me some letters from gentlemen who claim that on account of its value as a pasturage and on account of its value as hay when mowed for that purpose, they object to having it exterminated on their land. Yet the proof also is that when it matures, which it does about the 1st of September up in the latitude where it prevails now, and when it has had a fair chance to grow, it becomes an enormous weed, full of what I might call thorns; they are pricks that nobody can handle. Where the weeds are thick a horse ridden or driven through them is injured by contact with the thorns.

I find that it is spread in the way I shall state, and I wish to have the Senate understand this matter. When the frost comes and then the winds afterwards—and that is a country in which winds prevail—it breaks off at the ground. Then these large weeds are blown by the wind for miles, and at every step of their progress they deposit some of their seed, so that in a prairie country and in a level country like the country up there is with this process existing no man can protect himself against the weed by his own unaided exertions. Some of the persons who have written here say that the weed has already cost the farming interest of that country several million dollars. I admit that it is a very serious pest, and the question which engages my attention now is how we may deal with it.

The bill as drawn up can not be enforced, so as to make an effectual extirpation of the weed, and I should like to call the attention of Senators who desire to have the weed exterminated to that fact. Now, if the United States are to undertake by their own machinery to extirpate the weed, the United States, by their agent, will have to go upon every quarter section of land in which the weed is found (and I understand that there are about 45,000 square miles now in which it is found) and commence a process either of plowing them up or of cutting them up. I wish to call the attention of Senators to the question whether, under the Constitution, the United States can enter upon private property, and there, against the will of the owner, plow or dig up or perform any other operation in respect to this weed? I confess I can not see how that can be done.

So, I say, if the bill is passed as reported by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] it will be utterly inefficient to produce the result which he desires and which I desire and which the people of the Northwest desire. You can not go upon a man's land and cut and plow and dig without his consent, and there is no authority in the Constitution of the United States which allows Congress to invest one of its agents with power to enter upon land for this purpose.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me for a moment?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that what he says can not be done has been done repeatedly and was done explicitly in the pleuro-pneumonia act of 1884, and that Federal officials went into cattle pastures all over the country and exterminated pleuro-pneumonia just as we propose they shall exterminate this poison to agriculture.

Mr. GEORGE. Does the Senator know of an instance in which they went upon a man's land against his consent?

Mr. HANSBROUGH. They went into his stable.

Mr. GEORGE. Did they go into his stable without his consent? That is the point. Of course the United States can send its agent upon any man's land if the man will consent to it.

Mr. HIGGINS. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GEORGE. I would rather develop this idea a little more fully, and then I will answer the Senator's question.

I have evidence here that some of the landholders believe the weed is a blessing. Here it is. The Senator from North Dakota smiles, but I will read it. Here is a letter addressed to the Department from Winnipeg, Manitoba, in which the writer says it is a blessing. Here is an article from the Dakota Farmer, an agricultural paper, from which I believe I will read a sentence or two.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. It is not an editorial article.

Mr. GEORGE. It says:

> I object to any law compelling me to destroy an article that is a benefit to me because it is a damage to other men who wish to follow a system of farming that will ruin any man and any country.

That is from an article taken from the Dakota Farmer. Then here is another from the Northwest Farmer, an agricultural paper, in which the writer advocates the idea that it is a blessing. I believe as far as I can learn that it is a curse rather than a blessing. I believe that whilst it is a blessing in some small degree, yet taking the whole together it is a very great curse. But yet there are men who believe it is a benefit. How can an agent of the United States go upon the land of that man and perform his operations without his consent? I wish to call the serious attention of the lawyers of the Senate to that proposition. You can not do it.

There is, however, a jurisdiction which the United States have, and which they may properly exercise in this matter, and that is the mere power of appropriation. Since the days of Mr. Monroe as President of the United States the distinction between the power to appropriate money and jurisdiction over the subject of which the appropriation is made has been well understood and well recognized. The United States may grant money to the States to enable them to do certain work, as they have done, but that does not mean that the United States themselves may take the money and go into the States and do the work and have jurisdiction over it. That is the point to which I desire to call the attention of Senators who wish to have a law on this subject which is worth something.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. May I ask the Senator from Mississippi a question on that point?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Does the Senator from Mississippi believe that if an appropriation were made by Congress to a State in order to enable the State to do what is now proposed to be done by the United States the State in that case would have any more power to go on the land of a private person than the United States has?

Mr. GEORGE. I have no doubt about that, because that is within the jurisdiction of the States. The destruction of a noxious weed is entirely within the jurisdiction of the States. It comes within the police power of the States.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. What does the Senator say in regard to the public lands of the United States?

Mr. GEORGE. I will come to that. The destruction of noxious animals, noxious weeds, and all that sort of thing is peculiarly within the jurisdiction of a State. It may do what it pleases on that subject, and many of the States have laws on the subject already; some of the Northwestern States have laws upon the subject. I should like the Senator from Oregon to point out under what clause of the Constitution of the United States the United States may by one of their agents or employés enter upon a man's land against his consent to destroy a noxious weed. He will find trouble on that subject.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. If the Senator will allow me, after all it comes back to the question as to whether Congress has power to legislate on the subject.

Mr. GEORGE. Exactly.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon. Congress has power to levy taxes, for instance; to license breweries, distilleries, and all that kind of thing. Having that power the United States has the authority, without the consent of the owner of the private property, to enter upon that private property and do all that the law requires to be done in order to execute the law. If the power exists in this case, as I believe it does under the general clause, to legislate against this noxious weed, then the authority to do everything that is necessary to be done in order to execute legislation under that power exists, and you can go on private property or any other property in order to extirpate the weed and execute the law.

Mr. GEORGE. Now, I agree with the Senator exactly. If the power exist on the part of Congress to declare the weed a noxious weed and to destroy it, then Congress may enter upon the land for the purpose of the destruction. But that is the very point in dispute. I never before heard it contended that the United States may declare any particular weed or grass growing upon the farms of this country a noxious weed or grass, and thereupon proceed, without the consent of the State and without the consent of the owner, to extirpate that weed or grass. That is a proposition which I undertake to say the Senator from Oregon in his cool moments will not assert.

I endeavored to draw a distinction between the power of jurisdiction over a matter and the power to appropriate. That distinction is plain in our history. If it were not, if we had no power to appropriate money except where we had jurisdiction and control of the thing to which it is appropriated, you would wipe out the Agricultural Department entirely; you would wipe out the Geological Survey entirely; you would wipe out a great many other institutions which we have kept up by appropriations made under the general power of Congress to appropriate money where it has no jurisdiction over the thing.

Mr. President, I wish to say that I am anxious to have this weed extirpated. I believe it is a great curse to that part of the country, and I believe it will become a greater curse the longer we delay or the longer there is delay in working it out. Now, what are we going to do? Here are some people—how many I do not know—who believe the weed is a blessing and not a curse. You can not, by authority of Congress, go on the land of such a man. Your agent would be sued for trespass; he could not enter.

Then what are we to do? There is a way out of it, I think, and that way is pointed out by the amendments offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE]. There is this equity in favor of the adoption of his amendments. In the seven States in which this weed exists there are public lands to the amount of 125,246,124 acres. These lands are affected by the weed. The interests and rights of the United States as landed proprietor are affected by the prevalence of the weed. The United States may, in virtue of their proprietorship of these lands, make an appropriation to rid those lands from this pest in common with the lands of private persons in the same neighborhood or in the same State, and the United States may authorize the States to do it as is proposed by the amendments offered by the Senator from South Dakota.

Mr. HUNTON. Will my friend read that amendment, so that I may understand what it is?

Mr. GEORGE. It requires the Secretary of Agriculture to make—

as fair an estimate as practicable of the total cost of exterminating said thistle in each of the States in which it exists. He shall, thereupon, divide the sum hereinafter appropriated among said States in the proportion that the cost of exterminating said thistle in each shall bear to the aggregate cost of such extermination in all the States.

Another amendment provides—

That the sum of $1,000,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying out this act, and the same shall be paid out of the Treasury to the Secretary of Agriculture on warrants made by him.

Then the third section proposed requires the Secretary of Agriculture to pay to the governor of each of the several States in which the thistle is found the quota of the State, and the governor shall enter into a contract in writing that the money shall be appropriated to this purpose. Those are the amendments. There is no jurisdiction assumed. The United States, as the proprietor of 125,000,000 acres of land in the seven States, contributes $1,000,000 for the purpose of exterminating the weed. No question of jurisdiction will arise. The State then takes control of it, and does the work. The total cost of exterminating the weed will amount to several million.

There is another point to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate, and especially of the Senator from North Dakota, who is in charge of the bill. It is shown in the evidence which I have here that the weed comes up in the wheat fields, and that the only way to exterminate the weed when it has thus infested a wheat field is to destroy the wheat. If you allow it to seed, then all work in the way of killing it or exterminating it is put off until the next season when the new plant comes up. So under the bill the very extraordinary spectacle is witnessed of a mere agent of the United States going on a man's farm and plowing up his wheat for the purpose of destroying a weed which the man may say, "I prefer to have." I call the attention of the Senator to that clause; whereas under the amendment offered by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] the money is given to the State, and the State, through its local organization, will proceed in its own way to spend the money, together with its own money and the money that may be contributed either by taxation or by voluntary contributions, to exterminate it.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Mississippi allow me to ask him if he concedes the power to appropriate money from the Federal Treasury to a State for such a purpose?

Mr. GEORGE. I have no doubt we have the power to appropriate this money, and that it is justified upon the ground that we are landed proprietors in those States to the amount of 125,000,000 acres of land, and that our lands are as much affected by the weed as the lands of any private individual. In addition to that it, would be impossible, according to all proof here, for the citizens who own land to exterminate the weed upon their land if it is allowed to grow upon adjoining public lands.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion, I am very glad he finds an excuse in the idea of improving the lands that the Government owns. There may be some plausibility in that doctrine.

Mr. GEORGE. I am not making a speech to make it plausible to the Senator from Tennessee. I know very well his views on these subjects, and I know his views are not in accord either with the Constitution of the United States or the practice of the Government under it.

Mr. HARRIS. I am very glad to have that oracular announcement. Let it go of record.

Mr. GEORGE. Whether it be oracular or not, it is the truth. That is all.

Mr. President, the Secretary of Agriculture has been consulted upon this subject, and I think his views are entitled to some weight. I will read some questions that he propounds.

Will the owners of these lands—

Says the Secretary of Agriculture—

unanimously consent to their invasion at any and all times and seasons by the hired weed-killers of the General Government?

Some of them will not, and if you leave any of them untouched, then all your expenditure amounts to nothing, because that little will seed all the lands adjoining and then the next will seed the other lands, and soon it would be the same thing it is now. You have to exterminate every one of them.

Will landowners and railroads submit to a Federal authority at Washington, thousands of miles away, invading their real property and interfering with its tillage?

There is another question. Then says the Secretary:

Do you believe that the Federal Government can legally empower the Department of Agriculture, through its agents, to enter upon private lands for the purposes mentioned?

Then he asserts:

The successful extirpation of this thistle depends upon the virtual confiscation of all infested crops, or upon the abandonment of the lands which bear those crops, during the process of extermination.

How are we going to force men to do that? I think the best disposition to make of this question is contained in one of the amendments proposed by the Senator from South Dakota. We will give the States the money and let them exterminate the weed themselves.

I wish to call attention to another point in the bill. The Secretary of Agriculture is required—

To make written contracts with residents of said districts for the destruction and extermination of all Russian thistle or Russian cactus wherever found growing upon the highways, in cultivated fields.

There is the express authority given here to enter into a man's field to destroy his property in order to destroy the thistle. I say the Government of the United States can not do that, but we can give the money to a State and allow the State to expend it in its own way for this purpose.

Upon abandoned lands—

Whatever that may be. I do not know what it is. Will the Senator from North Dakota explain what the bill means by "abandoned lands?"

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator from Mississippi will permit me I will explain what it means. It means the agricultural lands that are so thickly overgrown with this thistle that the owners can not do anything with them, and therefore abandon them.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. That is precisely what it means.

Mr. GEORGE. Very well; then I understand that. That is one thing the Government may do. If the lands are so bad that they are abandoned, of course it is all right; but what about the cultivated fields? Now, I ask my friend from Nebraska, who is a good lawyer, where in the Constitution he finds the authority for Congress to authorize one of the agents of the Government to go into a man's wheat field and destroy the wheat in order to destroy the thistle?

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator from Mississippi will allow me I will answer the question, because there is the gist of the whole argument. If the Government has the power to follow a common enemy of the race through this country, it has the power to follow him into the house of any individual upon the land of any individual; and because this weed, which is not indigenous to this country but was brought here, is destructive of the agriculture of the country, not of one farm simply but a whole section of country, and is a weed that is passing from State to State, as this weed is, the power of the Government is ample to go into the field of any particular individual and extirpate the weed or cause the owner of the land to do so. I never yet have discovered anything in the Constitution or in the constitutional history of this country that would in the slightest degree prohibit the Government from doing that.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me?

Mr. GEORGE. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The Senator has laid great stress upon the lack of power in the Government to go upon private premises for the extermination of the weed. I call his attention to section 2 of the proposed act. I further call his attention to the fact that this matter was discussed in the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and that at the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi, section 2, which is identical with section 2 of the pleuro-pneumonia act, was inserted in the bill. I think, if the Senator will read it, he will find it fully covers his objections. I will ask the Secretary to read at the desk, for the information of the Senate, section 2 of the bill.

Mr. GEORGE. It may be read after a while. I have read it. The Senator is mistaken in supposing that I am the author of the idea of placing section 2 in the bill. I declined to have anything to do with the bill in the committee, except that I was willing the United States, on account of their proprietorship of public lands in those States, should contribute a liberal quota for the purpose of exterminating the weed.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The Senator will remember that in the discussion in the committee, he raised the question that he raises here, and that I called his attention——

Mr. GEORGE. I do not care to waste my time in discussing what took place in the committee.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Very well.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to state that whatever is said to the contrary is not correct.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. GEORGE. I never gave my assent to the bill in the committee in any shape, manner, or form. On the contrary, I dissented from it, and the Senator when he reported the bill was directed by me to state (and he complied with the direction) that it was a majority report only.

Of course, Mr. President, I would not be guilty of the absurdity of taking section 2 as wiping out the constitutional objection to which I have alluded. Section 2 is absurd on its face as applied to the bill. Section 2 speaks, you understand, of regulations to be prepared by the Secretary of Agriculture and submitted to the States for their coöperation, and it also provides for the acceptance by the Secretary of Agriculture of rules and regulations formed by the States. It provides for coöperation, but if section 2 is to be considered as the limit of the power of the Secretary of Agriculture on this subject it contains a very remarkable provision. He is authorized—

To expend so much of the money appropriated by this act as may be necessary in the execution of said plans and methods, and—to prevent the spread of Russian thistle or Russian cactus from one State or Territory to another.

That seems to confine the power of the Secretary of Agriculture to the simple duty of preventing the spread of this thistle from one State to another; but the point is, if the Senator relies upon section 2 as giving the authority to the Secretary of Agriculture to enter upon lands, then he can not enter until the States have formulated their rules or agreed to his rules, and that can only be done by the Legislatures, and it destroys the groundwork as set out in the Senator's report for action now by the Senate. He says the Legislatures do not meet for a year. So if you rely upon the coöperation authorized by section 2 as giving authority to the Secretary of Agriculture to enter upon the lands, he can not go on the lands until the Legislatures shall have met and given him authority to do so. I admit when the Legislatures do meet and give him authority he can do it, but he goes there then not in virtue of Federal law, but in virtue of State law.

That is one of the great defects in the bill. It is that whilst it seemingly authorizes immediate action upon the part of the Secretary of Agriculture, it in legal and constitutional effect prevents his action until the Legislatures of the several States shall meet and authorize him to do it.

Mr. President, I have said about all I desire to say on this subject, with one more remark, that it would be a very remarkable spectacle that the local authorities of a State infested by this pest should be utterly ignored, and that the business of exterminating the thistle by plowing, and digging, and fire, and the destruction of crops should be confided to the Secretary of Agriculture when the people interested are not to be consulted, when they are to do nothing, and are not to have any agency whatever in destroying the pest. With these remarks I submit the case.

Mr. ALLEN. Before the Senator from Mississippi takes his seat I should like to ask him a question. Certainly there would be no constitutional objection to the Government passing a law prohibiting the importation of this weed or the seed of the weed. Would there be?

Mr. GEORGE. No.

Mr. ALLEN. Now, if we had a law prohibiting the importation of this weed, preventing it from being brought into the country, attaching proper penalties thereto, and it was brought here in violation of that law, would not the Government have the right to follow it and the weeds that it reproduced throughout the entire country until it was exterminated? Would there not be clear constitutional power on the part of the Government to do so?

Mr. GEORGE. There would not. It could follow the seed where it could find it imported into a State in violation of law and seize it as smuggled goods; but after it has changed its nature and become something else, I should take it there is not an earthly basis for the Senator's statement. For instance, to show how absurd the position is (if I may use that term, as I do with the greatest respect), the United States has the right to prohibit the introduction of wheat into this country under the commerce clause, and to prohibit the introduction of any article of commerce. It has done so. Sometimes it is done directly; sometimes it is done by a prohibitory tariff. Does the Senator from Nebraska say that if Congress could in its wisdom decide that the introduction of a particular kind of wheat into this country should be prohibited, and then if it were smuggled and planted Congress could go to the field in which it was planted and extirpate the growing wheat. If it could do that, then, according to the argument of the Senator, when that crop is gathered and another crop is sown, as long as you can trace the crop to the original prohibited introduction of the seed, the Government of the United States would have a right to go in and destroy the crop.

Of course the Senator does not mean anything of that sort. Besides, that is purely a hypothetical inquiry and has nothing to do with this case. Congress has not prohibited the introduction of the seed. It came here without any prohibitory law on the part of the United States, and therefore any argument based upon the suggestion of the Senator is worthless.

Mr. ALLEN. I think the Senator from Mississippi is clearly wrong upon this proposition. We have laws authorizing a quarantine against cholera, for instance, and diseases of that character. The Government gets its power to pass those laws in consequence of those diseases being the common enemy of our people, and its duty to preserve every material interest of the Union.

Mr. GEORGE. Under the power to regulate commerce.

Mr. ALLEN. And because they are of foreign origin, and destructive of our commerce and the health of our people. Now, would the Senator from Mississippi deny that if a patient suffering with the Asiatic cholera should by any secret means gain a footing upon the shores of this country in violation of the law of the Government, that Congress, as a necessary incident of the power to pass that law, would not only have a right to quarantine that patient, but would have the further right of quarantining every other patient to whom the disease might be communicated by the first? It strikes me that there can be no question about that power.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator's argument fails in this, that no law of Congress ever prohibited the introduction of this seed.

Mr. ALLEN. But the question is a constitutional question, not a statutory question. Here is a weed that is a native of Russia. It is not indigenous to this country at all. It is conceded to be destructive to the agriculture of the country. It is a foreign enemy to the commerce and agriculture of this country. Now, if it is destructive to the agriculture of the country I ask the Senator from Mississippi if the Government does not possess implied power to destroy it and its consequences when it is brought here?

Mr. GEORGE. Now, let me ask the Senator from Nebraska a question. He is a good lawyer. If there is anything settled in constitutional exegesis in this country, it is that there must be either an expressed grant of power or you must have an implied power, and when you have the implied power, says the Supreme Court, you must put your finger upon the express power from which the implication comes. Will the Senator put his finger upon the express grant of power which authorizes Congress to interfere in this matter?

Mr. ALLEN. I do not take the definition of the Senator from Mississippi in the language in which he puts it. The Supreme Court have held, and jurists and statesmen have held from the organization of the Government, that although a power may not be expressed in the Constitution in words, if it is a power essential to the life and welfare of the Government, a power such as the Government could not refuse to execute and at the same time sustain itself, that power is granted by implication, by irresistible and conclusive implication, as conclusively and fully as though it were expressed.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. No court in the world ever held any such doctrine as is stated by the Senator; and if it did, it amounts to just this, that whatever Congress would think would be necessary for the life of the nation Congress might do; and of course that amounts simply to destroying all constitutional limitations whatever.

Mr. ALLEN. With all due deference to my distinguished friend from Mississippi, whose legal judgment I highly appreciate, I must say to him that not only the Supreme Court of the United States have held the doctrine that I state in substance, but there is not a court of last resort of any of the States of the Union where this question has been presented that has not held substantially the same thing.

Mr. GEORGE. If the Senator can find a case of that kind I will be much obliged to him.

Mr. ALLEN. It is that power which goes to the foundation of every government itself. It is the inherent power of self-preservation, the power to preserve itself against the common enemy, whether that enemy be an army of invasion, a deadly disease, or a destructive weed which destroys its agriculture.

Suppose our Constitution were silent as the grave upon the subject of raising armies to repel an invading foe. Suppose there were nothing said in the Constitution upon that subject, would the Senator from Mississippi claim that this Government would be powerless to raise armies and equip navies and repel invasion simply because there was no word conferring that power in the Constitution? It is an implied power that this Government possesses; an implied power that every government possesses. In fact, it is impossible to conceive of the existence of a government without that power.

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. We are here construing the Constitution as it is written and not as it might have been written.

Mr. ALLEN. I understand that quite well.

Now, Mr. President, this weed, the ravages of which I think the Senator from Mississippi fails to fully comprehend, is more destructive of the agriculture of this country than the pleuro-pneumonia is of the cattle interest. It aims directly at the very foundation of our agriculture. It destroys the chief industry of this nation. It is a common and foreign foe, not invading directly our commerce, but indirectly, in consequence of invading our agriculture; and yet we are told when this common enemy is brought from the shores of a foreign country, and is invading State after State and ruining its agricultural lands, that under the Constitution the Government has no power to check and eradicate it.

Mr. GEORGE. No; not exactly. The Senator is not answering my argument. I have said that the Government has the right to appropriate money to States to aid them to do it, and that ought to satisfy the Senator.

Mr. ALLEN. Then I call the attention of the Senator from Mississippi to another rule which he will recognize, that if the Government has not the power to meet this thing directly it has no constitutional power to meet it indirectly by the appropriation of money, for nothing is better settled in our law than the doctrine that you can not accomplish by indirection that which can not be accomplished directly.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 1836) to give effect to the award rendered by the Tribunal of Arbitration at Paris, under the treaty between the United States and Great Britain concluded at Washington, February 29, 1892, for the purpose of submitting to arbitration certain questions concerning the preservation of the fur seals.

The message also announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3603) to require railroad companies operating railroads in the Territories over a right of way granted by the Government to establish stations and depots at all town sites on the lines of said roads established by the Interior Department; agreed to the further conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WHEELER of Alabama, Mr. KILGORE, and Mr. AVERY managers at the further conference on the part of the House.

THE REVENUE BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. VILAS in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

Mr. PEFFER and Mr. CALL addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Kansas to yield to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. PEFFER. For what purpose.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from Kansas to yield to me that I may move to proceed to the consideration of executive business. I desire a short executive session.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from Kansas will not yield at this time. I think the Senator from Florida and the Senate can come to an agreement with respect to a time when he may have an executive session, but I hope it will not be held now.

Mr. PEFFER. I had taken the floor for the purpose of engaging in the discussion of the pending bill and would prefer not to yield at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas declines to yield the floor. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. CALL. Do I understand that the Senator from Kansas declines to yield?

Mr. PEFFER. If the executive session would not require much time, and the Senator from Florida is prepared to assure me upon that point, I should not object to yielding; but I prefer not to pass over three or four hours and begin my remarks this evening.

Mr. WASHBURN. I suggest to the Senator from Kansas to commence his speech to-morrow morning.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator from Kansas will allow me, I will move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield for that purpose?

Mr. PEFFER. I will yield on condition that I shall have the floor after the executive session.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope, if the motion is made, it will be voted down at this hour. There are times——

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order. Is a motion to go into executive session debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no motion yet entertained by the Chair to go into executive session. The Senator from Kansas has not yielded to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understood the Senator from Florida to make the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield?

Mr. PEFFER. I will yield for the purpose of allowing the Senator from Florida to make a motion to go into executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas yields the floor.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CALL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARRIS. Upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken resulted—yeas 31, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—31.

Mr. DINGLEY. Before that is done will the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] please state the point of the disagreement?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The House passed a bill providing that railroad companies operating railroads in the Territories, over a right of way, obtained by grants from Congress, should be required to stop their trains at all town sites established along the lines of said railroads by the Interior Department.

I think the House understands that this law only applies to two railroads in Oklahoma. The officers of these two railroads refuse to stop their trains at town sites which have from three to four thousand inhabitants, and the purpose of the bill was to prevent the continuance of this wrong and injustice.

The Senate passed the House bill with an amendment which provided that within twenty days after the passage of the act the governor of Oklahoma should, after thirty days' notice, hold an election in two of the counties of Oklahoma for the purpose of determining a permanent county seat for said counties.

The House by a very decided vote refused to concur in the Senate amendment, and the conferees on the part of the House seek to carry out the will of the body of which they are members.

There are many objections to the Senate amendment. One objection is that there is no registration in the two counties where it is proposed to hold the election. Another is that it appears to be admitted that the purpose of tacking on the amendment was to defeat the bill——

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Then you have made no progress since the conferees were appointed?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. No, we have held several conferences, but no agreement has been reached.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The bill is in the same situation as when the first conference was ordered?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Yes: the conferees can only report that no agreement has been reached.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. What is the object of reporting and asking for a further conference?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. We have some very full information which has been received since the last conference. It is evidence from Oklahoma. We shall be able to show——

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Could not you use that evidence before the conference committee without bringing the bill back into the House?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. After the Senate conferees reported the bill back to the Senate and asked for a further conference, we thought our power as conferees was at an end, and that we could not proceed and hold another conference without further instructions or orders from the House. I think that is the correct parliamentary view of the situation.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the further conference asked for.

The further conference was agreed to, and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. WHEELER of Alabama, Mr. KILGORE, and Mr. AVERY.

SEALER OF WEIGHTS AND MEASURES, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 3246) for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures for the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment thereto; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following Senate bills, which were severally read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the committees named.

A bill (S. 655) to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace in the District of Columbia, and to regulate the proceedings before them—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 491) granting a pension to Alice K. Potter, widow of Gen. Joseph H. Potter, deceased—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

BERING SEA AWARD.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (S. 1836) to give effect to the award rendered by the Tribunal of Arbitration at Paris, under the treaty between the United States and Great Britain concerning the preservation of fur seals.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, the bill the title of which has just been read passed the Senate unanimously, and a bill exactly like it has been considered by the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House, and I was directed to report that bill favorably to the House.

There are important reasons why this bill should be acted upon immediately. It is to give effect to the award rendered by the Tribunal of Arbitration in Paris under the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, concerning the preservation of fur seals, and the bill is drawn exactly in accordance with the treaty made between the United States and Great Britain, in February, 1892, and in accordance with the award. I hope therefore that unanimous consent will be given for its present consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY] asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of this bill.

Mr. PAYNE. When this matter was brought up yesterday I objected to its consideration, not because I did not understand the importance of the bill, and that it was a good bill; but I thought then that, being a good bill, it would probably pass the House by suspension of the rules, substantially by action of the Committee on Rules or otherwise, and that there would be no particular delay. For that reason I objected to its consideration on yesterday. On subsequent reflection, I thought that this was the first really good bill of a general nature that was liable to pass this House, and thought I ought to withdraw the objection I had made. I went to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] last evening, when he proposed to make the motion to adjourn, and told him if he would withhold the motion I would withdraw the objection then. Now, then, being a good bill, I hope it will pass this House, and yet I suppose it is useless to hope that. We will wait and see.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 1836) to give effect to the award rendered by the Tribunal of Arbitration at Paris, under the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, concluded at Washington, February 29, 1892, for the purpose of submitting to arbitration certain questions concerning the preservation of the fur seals.

Whereas the following articles of the award of the Tribunal of Arbitration, constituted under the treaty concluded at Washington the 29th of February, 1892, between the United States of America and Her Majesty the Queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, were delivered to the agents of the respective Governments on the 15th day of August, 1893;

ARTICLE 1.

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall forbid their citizens and subjects respectively to kill, capture, or pursue at any time, and in any manner whatever, the animals commonly called fur seals, within a zone of 60 miles around the Pribilov Islands, inclusive of the territorial waters.

The miles mentioned in the preceding paragraph are geographical miles, of 60 to a degree of latitude.

ARTICLE 2.

The two governments shall forbid their citizens and subjects respectively to kill, capture, or pursue, in any manner whatever, during the season extending, each year, from the 1st of May to the 31st of July, both inclusive, the fur seals on the high sea, in the part of the Pacific Ocean, inclusive of the Bering Sea, which is situated to the north of the thirty-fifth degree of north latitude, and eastward of the one hundred and eightieth degree of longitude from Greenwich till it strikes the water boundary described in Article 1 of the treaty of 1867 between the United States and Russia, and following that line up to Berings Straits.

ARTICLE 3.

During the period of time and in the waters in which the fur-seal fishing is allowed, only sailing vessels shall be permitted to carry on or take part in fur-seal fishing operations. They will, however, be at liberty to avail themselves of the use of such canoes or undecked boats, propelled by paddles, oars, or sails, as are in common use as fishing boats.

ARTICLE 4.

Each sailing vessel authorized to fish for fur seals must be provided with a special license issued for that purpose by its Government, and shall be required to carry a distinguishing flag to be prescribed by its Government.

ARTICLE 5.

The masters of the vessels engaged in fur-seal fishing shall enter accurately in their official log book the date and place of each fur-seal fishing operation, and also the number and sex of the seals captured upon each day. These entries shall be communicated by each of the two governments to the other at the end of each fishing season.

ARTICLE 6.

The use of nets, firearms, and explosives shall be forbidden in the fur-seal fishing. This restriction shall not apply to shotguns when such fishing takes place outside of Bering Sea, during the season when it may be lawfully carried on.

ARTICLE 7.

The two governments shall take measures to control the fitness of the men authorized to engage in fur-seal fishing; these men shall have been proved fit to handle with sufficient skill the weapons by means of which this fishing may be carried on.

ARTICLE 8.

The regulations contained in the preceding articles shall not apply to Indians dwelling on the coast of the territory of the United States or of Great Britain, and carrying on fur-seal fishing in canoes or undecked boats not transported by or used in connection with other vessels and propelled wholly by paddles, oars or sails, and manned by not more than five persons each, in the way hitherto practiced by the Indians, provided such Indians are not in the employment of other persons, and provided that, when so hunting in canoes or undecked boats, they shall not hunt fur seals outside of territorial waters under contract for the delivery of the skins to any person.

This exemption shall not be construed to affect the municipal law of either country, nor shall it extend to the waters of Bering Sea or the waters of the Aleutian Passes.

Nothing herein contained is intended to interfere with the employment of Indians as hunters or otherwise in connection with fur-sealing vessels as heretofore.

ARTICLE 9.

The concurrent regulations hereby determined with a view to the protection and preservation of the fur seals, shall remain in force until they have been, in whole or in part, abolished or modified by common agreement between the governments of the United States and of Great Britain.

The said concurrent regulations shall be submitted every five years to a new examination, so as to enable both interested governments to consider whether, in the light of past experience, there is occasion for any modification thereof.

Now, therefore, be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no citizen of the United States, or person owing the duty of obedience to the laws or the treaties of the United States, nor any person belonging to or on board of a vessel of the United States, shall kill, capture, or pursue, at any time, or in any manner whatever, outside of territorial waters, any fur seal in the waters surrounding the Pribilov Islands within a zone of 60 geographical miles (60 to a degree of latitude) around said islands, exclusive of the territorial waters.

SEC. 2. That no citizen of the United States, or person above described in section 1 of this act, nor any person belonging to or on board of a vessel of the United States, shall kill, capture, or pursue, in any manner whatever, during the season extending from the 1st day of May to the 31st day of July, both inclusive, in each year, any fur seal on the high seas outside of the zone mentioned in section 1, and in that part of the Pacific Ocean, including Bering Sea, which is situated to the north of the thirty-fifth degree of north latitude and to the east of the one hundred and eightieth degree of longitude from Greenwich, till it strikes the water boundary described in Article 1 of the treaty of 1867, between the United States and Russia, and following that line up to Bering Straits.

SEC. 3. No citizen of the United States or person above described in the first section of this act shall, during the period and in the waters in which by section 2 of this act the killing of fur seals is not prohibited, use or employ any vessel, nor shall any vessel of the United States be used or employed in carrying on or taking part in fur-seal fishing operations, other than a sailing vessel propelled by sails exclusively, and such canoes or undecked boats propelled by paddles, oars, or sails, as may belong to and be used in connection with such sailing vessel; nor shall any sailing vessel carry on or take part in such operations without a special license obtained from the Government for that purpose, and without carrying a distinctive flag prescribed by the Government for the same purpose.

SEC. 4. That every master of a vessel licensed under this act to engage in fur-seal fishing operations shall accurately enter in his official log book the date and place of every such operation, and also the number and sex of the seals captured each day; and on coming into port, and before landing cargo, the master shall verify, on oath, such official log book as containing a full and true statement of the number and character of his fur-seal fishing operations, including the number and sex of seals captured; and for any false statement willfully made by a person so licensed by the United States in this behalf he shall be subject to the penalties of perjury; and any seal skins found in excess of the statement in the official log book shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 5. That no person or vessel engaging in fur-seal fishing operations under this act shall use or employ in any such operations, any net, firearm, airgun, or explosive: Provided, however, That this prohibition shall not apply to the use of shotguns in such operations outside of Bering Sea during the season when the killing of fur seals is not there prohibited by this act.

SEC. 6. That the foregoing sections of this act shall not apply to Indians dwelling on the coast of the United States, and taking fur seals in canoes or undecked boats propelled wholly by paddles, oars, or sails, and not transported by or used in connection with other vessels, or manned by more than five persons, in the manner heretofore practiced by the said Indians: Provided, however, That the exception made in this section shall not apply to Indians in the employment of other persons, or who shall kill, capture, or pursue fur seals outside of territorial waters under contract to deliver the skins to other persons, nor to the waters of Behring Sea or of the passes between the Aleutian Islands.

SEC. 7. That the President shall have power to make regulations respecting the special license and the distinctive flag mentioned in this act and regulations otherwise suitable to secure the due execution of the provisions of this act, and from time to time to add to, modify, amend, or revoke such regulations, as in his judgment may seem expedient.

SEC. 8. That, except in the case of a master making a false statement under oath in violation of the provisions of the fourth section of this act, every person guilty of a violation of the provisions of this act, or of the regulations made thereunder, shall for each offense be fined not less than $200, or imprisoned not more than six months, or both; and all vessels, their tackle, apparel, furniture, and cargo, at any time used or employed in violation of this act, or of the regulations made thereunder, shall be forfeited to the United States.

SEC. 9. That any violation of this act, or of the regulations made thereunder, may be prosecuted either in the district court of Alaska or in any district court of the United States in California, Oregon, or Washington.

SEC. 10. That if any unlicensed vessel of the United States shall be found within the waters to which this act applies, and at a time when the killing of fur seals is by this act there prohibited, having on board seal skins or bodies of seals, or apparatus or implements suitable for killing or taking seals; or if any licensed vessel shall be found in the waters to which this act applies, having on board apparatus or implements suitable for taking seals, but forbidden then and there to be used, it shall be presumed that the vessel in the one case and the apparatus or implements in the other was or were used in violation of this act until it is otherwise sufficiently proved.

SEC. 11. That it shall be the duty of the President to cause a sufficient naval force to cruise in the waters to which this act is applicable to enforce its provisions, and it shall be the duty of the commanding officer of any vessel belonging to the naval or revenue service of the United States, when so instructed by the President, to seize and arrest all vessels of the United States found by him to be engaged, used, or employed in the waters last aforesaid in violation of any of the prohibitions of this act, or of any regulations made thereunder, and to take the same, with all persons on board thereof, to the most convenient port in any district of the United States mentioned in this act, there to be dealt with according to law.

SEC. 12. That any vessel or citizen of the United States, or person described in the first section of this act, offending against the prohibitions of this act or the regulations thereunder, may be seized and detained by the naval or other duly commissioned officers of Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain, but when so seized and detained they shall be delivered as soon as practicable, with any witnesses and proofs on board, to any naval or revenue officer or other authorities of the United States, whose courts alone shall have jurisdiction to try the offense and impose the penalties for the same;

Provided, however, That British officers shall arrest and detain vessels and persons as in this section specified only after, by appropriate legislation, Great Britain shall have authorized officers of the United States duly commissioned and instructed by the President to that end to arrest, detain, and deliver to the authorities of Great Britain vessels and subjects of that government offending against any statutes or regulations of Great Britain enacted or made to enforce the award of the treaty mentioned in the title of this act.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, a treaty was concluded at Washington February 29, 1892, between the Governments of the United States and of Great Britain, submitting to arbitration certain questions which have arisen between those Governments concerning the jurisdictional rights of the United States in the waters of Bering Sea.

The articles of the award of the tribunal of the arbitration are set forth in the bill, and the bill is drawn in accordance with the stipulations of the treaty and in accordance with the award, the object of the bill being to give effect to the award rendered by the Tribunal of Arbitration at Paris, held under the treaty of 1892, for the purpose of submitting to arbitration certain questions concerning the preservation of fur seals.

The treaty to which I have referred provides in the fourteenth article that—

The high contracting parties engage to consider the result of the proceedings of the tribunal of arbitration, as a full, perfect, and final settlement of all the questions referred to the arbitrators.

This bill should pass immediately; our Government is pledged to stand by the award, and I hope there will be no opposition to the immediate passage of the bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman sits down I would like to call his attention to the last section of this bill.

By the way, I may say that the bill is exceedingly important, and should be passed at once; but there is a provision in the last section——

Mr. HITT. Section 12?

Mr. DINGLEY. Section 12. Authorizing a naval or other commissioned officer of Great Britain to seize vessels or to detain vessels of the United States, on condition, of course, that a reciprocal law shall be passed by Great Britain.

What I desire to know is whether there was a provision in the award for such legislation as this, and whether it is copied, somewhat perhaps, from the provisions in the treaty with other nations with reference to the suppression of the slave trade. This provision in the twelfth section of course is exceptional, where a British officer is authorized to seize an American vessel.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The section was drawn in accordance with the award, indeed the whole bill is drawn in accordance with the award and the stipulations of the treaty, and is somewhat similar to a provision in the treaty of 1870, to which he refers. The authority given to a naval or other commissioned officer of Great Britain to seize vessels or detain vessels of the United States is on condition that a reciprocal law shall be passed by Great Britain.

Mr. HITT. The section was drawn as it is in order to carry out in good faith the award of the Tribunal of Arbitration. It has been revised by the gentlemen who represented the United States before that tribunal, and is similar to a provision in the treaty of 1870, authorizing a search of our ships by British armed vessels, and a search of British ships by our armed vessels, for the suppression of the slave trade. That is the purpose and that is the precedent, and it was thought by those who drew the bill that this was absolutely essential in order to carry out the regulations to protect the seals contained in the award, which both this Government and the Government of Great Britain have promised by the treaty to accept and execute.

Mr. DINGLEY. But it does not go into effect until Great Britain shall pass a similar law?

Mr. HITT. It does not go into effect until a like act of Parliament is passed, which we are now waiting, which was introduced, but was withdrawn last Friday, and which will probably not be passed until we act. Nor could we with much grace reproach them for delay, for they may say "If you will not take care of your own seals you can not reproach us with being tardy."

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HOPKINS of Pennsylvania, for one week, on account of important business

To Mr. GROSVENOR, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. McKEIGHAN, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. DAVEY, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. MORSE, for two weeks, on account of sickness.

To Mr. MAHON, for five days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BROSIUS, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana, for two weeks, commencing on Monday, April 9, on account of important business.

To Mr. SCHERMERHORN, for ten days, on account of important business.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I was absent yesterday afternoon when the vote was taken upon the motion to pass the seigniorage bill over the veto of the President. I was called away by an important engagement about 4 o'clock, but before going I conferred with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAND], who had charge of the bill, and was informed that he would not ask for a vote until Saturday. Thinking it impossible that any vote could be taken, I left the Hall. I was fully protected by a pair with the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], but I desire to say, that the RECORD may show my position, that if present I would have voted to pass the bill over the veto, and would have favored a reasonable debate upon the proposition. I would not have been absent under any circumstances if it had seemed possible to reach a vote.

Mr. BOUTELLE. You would not have had an opportunity to say that much if you had been here.

Mr. BLAND. I wish to say the gentleman is correct in his statement. I had no idea that a vote would be taken; but the whole House seemed anxious to vote.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a personal explanation. After the election case of Hilborn and English was disposed of, I received a telegram which necessitated my leaving the House. I was very anxious to be present and vote upon the Bland seigniorage bill. I was informed, in conversation with various gentlemen, that no vote would be asked for by the gentleman from Missouri until Saturday. I was very desirous of having my views upon that question distinctly understood. I was in favor of the passage of this bill. If present, I would have earnestly and cheerfully voted to pass the bill over the veto of the President, and would have liked an opportunity to express my reasons for so voting. The gentleman with whom I was paired would have voted to sustain the veto.

Mr. ALLEN. I did not mislead the gentleman, did I? [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably absent yesterday afternoon when the vote was taken on the seigniorage bill. I desire to say that if I had been present I would have voted "no" on the question of passing the bill over the President's veto.

Mr. DRAPER. Mr. Speaker, since explanations of this kind seem to be in order, I will say that I left the House yesterday afternoon supposing that the vote on that bill would not be taken until Saturday. Had I been present I should have voted "no."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That there be printed and bound in cloth, of the proceedings of the Pan-American Medical Congress, held in Washington City, in September, 1893, under the authority of a joint resolution of Congress approved July 18, 1892, 10,000 copies; of which 2,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 4,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 4,000 for distribution by the Department of State; the same to be indexed under the direction of the Committee on Printing.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 1680) to amend an act approved January 31, 1893, entitled "An act to more effectually suppress gambling in the District of Columbia," etc.; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present the privileged report which I send to the desk, and ask for its present consideration.

The report was read, as follows:

Whereas by a communication to the House of Representatives under date of October 20, 1893, the Attorney-General of the United States informed the House that there is grave doubt as to the validity of the proceedings taken by the management of the Union Pacific Railway Company to place that road in the hands of receivers appointed by the United States circuit court, and that in their practical, if not their technical, operation and effect, such proceedings must be regarded as tending to seriously prejudice the interests of the United States as protected and secured by existing laws; and

Whereas the Attorney-General further reported that he had employed special counsel for the United States to represent the interests of the Government in said proceedings, which require, as he states, the continuous and almost exclusive attention of competent counsel, and that it is more than probable that the proper protection of the United States will be found to call for special legislation by Congress: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That the Attorney-General of the United States be, and is hereby, requested to inform the House what action, if any, has been taken by the special counsel employed by him to test the validity of the proceedings aforesaid, so far as they affect the United States, whether any effort has been made to secure the appointment of receivers to represent the interest of the United States in the management of said road, and what steps, if any, such counsel have taken to protect the same, and whether the receivers in charge of the said Union Pacific Railway were not appointed on the suggestion of the officers and directors thereof.

Finally, whether existing laws are sufficient to enable the Department of Justice to secure and protect the indebtedness due by said company to the United States.

The Committee on Pacific Railroads having had under consideration a resolution, introduced on the 3d instant, requesting certain information from the Attorney-General in regard to the action taken by the Department of Justice to protect the rights and interests of the United States in the Union Pacific Railroad Company, now in the hands of receivers, report the same favorably and recommend that the same do pass.

Mr. BOATNER. I ask for the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. BOATNER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

ISSUE OF CERTAIN TREASURY NOTES.

Mr. BAILEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following as a privileged report:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 2, 1894.

Mr. BAILEY submitted the following, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to the House of Representatives the amount of Treasury notes bearing interest at the rate of 7.3 per cent per annum, which were issued by the United States from June 30, 1861, to June 30, 1865; the dates on which they were issued, and the amount outstanding at the close of each fiscal year between the above-named dates and the date of their retirement."

The Committee on the Judiciary having had under consideration a resolution of inquiry addressed to the Secretary in reference to the issue of Treasury notes bearing interest at the rate 7.3 per cent per annum, respectfully recommend its adoption with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to the House of Representatives the amount of Treasury notes bearing interest at the rate of 7.3 per cent per annum issued by the United States from 1861 to 1870; the years when they were issued, the acts under which and the denominations in which they were issued, and the amount outstanding at the end of each fiscal year prior to 1870; the years when they were redeemed, and the manner in which they were redeemed. Also if the issues under each act could be distinguished from all other issues, and if so, how."

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I suppose there is no objection to the resolution, and I therefore ask for a vote.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was then adopted.

On motion of Mr. BAILEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

BRIDGE OVER ST. LOUIS RIVER.

Mr. BALDWIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5978) to authorize the construction of a steel bridge over the St. Louis River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. HAUGEN (interrupting the reading). Mr. Speaker, some mornings ago this bill was called up and unanimous consent was asked for its consideration. The bill was then read at length. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. UPDEGRAFF] objected to its consideration at that time, but has since withdrawn his objection, being satisfied that the measure is meritorious. The bill having been read in full once I ask unanimous consent that the further reading of it now be dispensed with.

Mr. PAYNE. Is it in the usual form of bridge bills?

Mr. HAUGEN. It is in the usual form and has been approved by the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk states that this bill has been read twice.

Mr. HAUGEN. It may have been. I know it has been read once.

There being no objection, the further reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BALDWIN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE OVER ST. LOUIS RIVER.

Mr. HAUGEN. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of another bridge bill, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. These two bills have been considered together, and the Chair submits the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin that this bill be now considered by unanimous consent.

The bill (H. R. 4765) to authorize the St. Louis River Bridge Company and the Duluth Transfer Railway Company to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge over the St. Louis River from a point at or near Grassy Point, in the village of West Duluth, Minn., to the most available point opposite, in the State of Wisconsin, was read.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The following amendment, reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, was read and agreed to:

Strike out, on page 2, lines 30 to 33, the following:

"That the right to charge tolls for the passage of wagons, carriages, vehicles of all kinds, animals, foot passengers, and travelers shall not extend beyond a period of twenty years from the passage of this act."

And insert the following:

"That said bridge and its approaches shall be made free of tolls to wagons, teams, foot passengers, and street railways at the end of twenty years from the passage of this act if not made free before the end of said time."

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HAUGEN, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. CHILDS. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 5649) providing an additional district judge in the northern district of Illinois.

The bill, with the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, was read.

Mr. McMILLIN. Reserving the right to object, let us have the report read.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the report will be read.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The report is long; would not the gentleman from Tennessee consent to hear a statement?

Mr. CHILDS. The report itself is very short, though there is considerable additional matter appended.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think we ought to take further time for the consideration of this measure.

Mr. CHILDS. This will take only a moment. The report is very brief.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think we shall have to have some further time to examine the measure.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana, as the Chair understands, objects.

Mr. CHILDS. I ask the gentleman from Indiana whether he will not give me an opportunity to explain this measure.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should be very glad to hear the gentleman; but I feel constrained to ask for further time to consider the bill.

LOAN OF ORDNANCE, ETC., TO HIGH SCHOOLS.

Mr. MERCER. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The joint resolution, authorizing the Secretary of War to loan ordnance and ordnance stores for military instruction in high schools, was read.

Mr. MERCER. I hope there will be no objection to the present consideration of this resolution.

Mr. McMILLIN. Has it been reported favorably by any committee?

Mr. MERCER. This resolution seeks to carry out the policy adopted by the present Secretary of War in introducing military training into the high schools of the United States. Though just entered upon, this policy where already tried has proved a great success.

Mr. McMILLIN. What I wish to know is whether this bill has been reported favorably by any committee?

Mr. MERCER. It has not been referred to any committee.

Mr. McMILLIN. It strikes me the measure is of sufficient importance to require consideration by a committee before action by the House is asked.

Mr. MERCER. It does not require any appropriation.

Mr. McMILLIN. But it practically appropriates property which has been paid for by the money of the Government.

Mr. MERCER. There are thirty thousand guns which have been turned in, and which are not required for use by the War Department.

Mr. McMILLIN. I presume the gentleman's proposition is right; but a measure which deals so extensively and in so many different places with property which may be of great value to the Government in case of an emergency, ought at least to have the consideration of the Commitee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MERCER. This is a very urgent case. The students are now being drilled in different parts of the country; and they need these guns for the purpose of military training. I have consulted the War Department——

Mr. McMILLIN. Vacation will be here before they can get the guns at any rate. I have no objection to the introduction and reference of the resolution. It may be a very proper measure; but I think bills of this class ought to be considered by a committee; and in the present case the committee itself would do well to call on the Secretary of War concerning the subject.

The SPEAKER. The present consideration of the joint resolution is objected to. It will be referred.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 158) was read twice, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MARY LEVANS.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5925) granting a pension to Mary Levans.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I do not wish to object to a pension bill, but I would like the privilege of asking the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that may be done.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. The gentleman, I believe, is chairman of the Committee on Pensions?

Mr. MOSES. I am.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Now, I understand this is a bill for a pension to the widow of a soldier of the war of 1812, or some Indian war?

Mr. MOSES. The war of 1817, the Seminole war. There is no general law, I will state, to cover this case.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I am not going to object to the gentleman's measure, but I want to say that there are numbers of the same class of people, who were participants in the war of 1856, in the States of Oregon and Washington, who endured hardships in the service of the country, and yet the gentleman's committee will not report their bill. He comes here asking pensions for his people when he declines to report a bill absolutely just and fair to the people I have the honor in part to represent. Now I never object to a pension bill and shall not object to this one.

Mr. MOSES. Your bill has never been brought to my attention.

Mr. STALLINGS. Has this bill been passed on in Committee of the Whole in the Friday night session?

Mr. MOSES. We have not reached it yet; and I ask unanimous consent to make an exception in this case. The committee unanimously reported the bill.

Mr. STALLINGS. I think it ought to take the same course as other bills of this character.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the regular order being demanded, the Clerk will now call the committees for reports.

RAILROAD INDEMNITY LANDS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BRODERICK, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a joint resolution (H. Res. 159) to authorize the intervention of the United States in a suit to determine rights to lands in railroad indemnity limits in California; which was referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. BRODERICK. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE ARMOND] asks leave to submit a minority report.

The SPEAKER. The minority report may be filed and printed with the report of the committee, if there be no objection.

There was no objection.

ACCEPTANCE OF CERTAIN DECORATIONS.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. 6424) to authorize Rear-Admiral John G. Walker and Surg. Gen. J. Rufus Tryon, of the United States Navy, to accept the decoration of the "Busto del Libertador" of the third class from the President of Venezuela; which was referred to the House Calendar.

PENSIONS.

Mr. ERDMAN, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported a bill (H. R. 6578), in lieu of House bill 3566, to pension certain persons not regularly mustered, their widows, children, and dependent relatives; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PRINTING FOR COMMITTEE ON PACIFIC RAILROADS.

On motion of Mr. REILLY, by unanimous consent, it was ordered that the Committee on Pacific Railroads be authorized to have printed such matters as are necessary for the consideration of subjects pending before the committee.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering appropriation bills, and pending that, I ask unanimous consent that the urgent deficiency bill be considered.

Mr. REED. I think we had better have the rules complied with.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

The gentleman from Texas moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole to consider general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

Mr. SAYERS. I should like to have permission to make a short explanation.

Mr. REED. If the same privilege is accorded to gentlemen upon this side.

Mr. SAYERS. It is very important that the urgent deficiency bill should pass as soon as possible, for the reason that the terms of the Federal courts will begin to be held in many of the States next week, and it is necessary that appropriations should be made for witness fees, jurors' fees, marshals' fees, and also for the support of prisoners.

Mr. REED. Why were not these appropriations made at the regular time?

Mr. SAYERS. Because in the last Congress the usual practice was followed of only appropriating about one-half the amount that was necessary for the support of the courts.

Mr. REED. How long has that been the custom?

Mr. SAYERS. Ever since I have been on the committee, and through the Fiftieth, Fifty-first, Fifty-second, and the present Congress, and I suppose for many years previous.

Mr. REED. Is this something that was saddled onto you by the Fifty-first Congress?

Mr. SAYERS. By the Fifty-second Congress.

Mr. REED. How much is the amount that you fell short of providing for the needs of the Government?

Mr. SAYERS. Well, I can not tell. I suppose about ten or twelve million dollars.

Mr. REED. And this after you had surpassed the billion dollar Congress, was it not?

Mr. SAYERS. I am not responsible for the appropriations of the last Congress.

Mr. REED. You have got to supply a deficiency of $12,000,000 after exceeding all that you clamored against, have you?

Mr. SAYERS. Well, Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to ask unanimous consent——

Mr. REED. I have no doubt the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] would like to get it through as quietly as possible.

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. And I sympathize with him; but from a sense of public duty, I want in a pointed way to call the attention of the House to it, because there are some questions which, thank Heaven, are still debatable in the House of Representatives, or in the Committee of the Whole at least.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS]?

Mr. SAYERS. Since the gentleman from Maine has called the attention of the committee to that question, I will state that these deficiencies, so far as the courts are concerned, are just about the same as the deficiencies which were made by the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. REED. I know, but they are at the end of a set of appropriations that were in excess of those of the Fifty-first Congress; an excess so bad that an actual change took place in the chairmanship of the Committee on Appropriations on account of them.

Mr. SAYERS. Oh, no.

Mr. REED. What was the reason——

Mr. SAYERS. The reason was——

Mr. REED. The reason for the change in the chairmanship of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. SAYERS. The Appropriations Committee are observing the same policy in regard to the support of the courts that has been observed for the past ten years.

Mr. REED. Does the gentleman know the reason for the change that was made in the chairmanship of the Committee on Appropriations, if it was not made for the extravagance of the last committee?

Mr. SAYERS. I do not know that there was any change made on that account.

Mr. REED. There was a change made in the chairmanship, and the gentleman [Mr. HOLMAN] who had been chairman of the committee before was noted for his frugality all over the country, and it seems that notwithstanding he had exceeded the billion-dollar Congress in his appropriations, yet the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], who is virgin soil, comes here to claim ten or twelve millions of dollars more in addition to that enormous excess over what was denounced as wickedness by the Democratic party from one end of the country to the other. I see the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] is listening, and perhaps his case will be brought up before we get much farther. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is here to speak for himself.

Mr. REED. I hope we shall have an explanation of both cases, for they were very extraordinary and astonished the country, to see such able men deposed for the work which they did, which, however, has not met the approval of the nation to any considerable extent.

Mr. HOLMAN rose.

Mr. REED. I see the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is anxious for an opportunity to speak, and I yield to him. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOLMAN. I will only occupy for a few minutes the time of the committee. For many years it has been customary for the Committee on Appropriations of the House, whether Democratic or Republican, to seek to retrench expenditures of our Federal judiciary. This effort has been made for years. There has been an opinion upon the part of the Appropriations Committee of the House that the expenses of the Federal judiciary were very excessive and unnecessary, and it is for that reason and others that many members of the House object to the enlargement of the Federal judiciary system and would be glad to see its jurisdiction greatly reduced. This state of affairs and growth of its expenditures has existed for a number of years under both Republican and Democratic Administrations, and I fear will continue to exist: but my friend from Texas is certainly mistaken as to the amount of deficiencies.

The expenditures for the Federal judiciary will have been of unexampled extravagance if so large an amount of increased appropriation is found to be necessary, as stated by him, to carry on the system for the present fiscal year.

Mr. SAYERS. I understand the gentleman from Maine asked me what would be the total amount of the deficiency, and I responded to that question, I thought it would be $10,000,000 or $12,000,000.

Mr. REED. What I wanted to say was——

Mr. SAYERS. I did not say $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 deficiency for the support of the United States courts.

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course that is correct.

Mr. REED. What I wanted to say——

Mr. HOLMAN. It is a well-known fact that within a comparatively few years there have been only $3,000,000 or $4,000,000 necessary to carry on our Federal judicial system. The increase is enormous, and that is why gentlemen propose to reduce its jurisdiction; but of course it is absurd to talk about $10,000,000 or $12,000,000 of deficiencies.

Mr. REED. What I wanted to say was, that after the appropriations that were so "bad," that the chairman of the committee was, so to speak, cashiered [laughter] for so exceeding the "bad Congress," called the Fifty-first Congress, called the "billion-dollar Congress;" for being in excess of a billion-dollar Congress, if I may so say, why is it that we have this $12,000,000 deficiency? After so bad a record, why should $12,000,000 be plastered on the country in addition, "gilding," as it were, "refined gold, and painting the lily?" [Laughter.] The statement of the gentleman from Indiana did not give any explanation as to whether he was punished on that account or not.

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, I do not mean to assert "that the gentleman from Indiana" has been punished for anything.

Mr. REED. I do not mean to say that he had.

Mr. HOLMAN (continuing). The Speaker of the House had the right to appoint whoever he thought well to appoint, and he exercised that privilege.

Mr. REED. That is so.

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not think the gentleman from Maine will find in that a matter for comfort or consolation.

Mr. REED. I do not.

Mr. HOLMAN. Changes will occur all the time in the organization of this House.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I was succeeded years ago as chairman on not coming back to Congress.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will meet the same experience the next time. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. REED. It may be. The pitcher that goes often to the fountain is liable to be broken; but I think the holding powers of the gentleman are still good.

Mr. HOLMAN. How was it that the change was made in the case of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Judge Kelley], one of the greatest political economists the House had for years. He was substituted. Will the gentleman give a reason for that?

Mr. REED. A reason! I am perfectly willing to give reasons for my conduct, but some of my predecessors and successors are not willing to do so.

Mr. HOLMAN. Can you give the reason why that change was made?

Mr. REED. Yes; I will very cheerfully give the reason. Judge Kelley had reached a period of years which the gentleman from Indiana, I am happy to say, has not yet reached, when his physical condition was not equal to the task. Now, I could wish gentlemen in my position would always be ready to give reasons as I do, and perhaps I may, without vanity, hope as good a reason. [Laughter.] And now, I have no doubt, in due course of time we will get an explanation, and I hope it will be more full and satisfactory, from the other gentleman [the gentleman from Illinois].

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman complains of the deficiency for the support of the United States courts. The estimates for deficiencies in the appropriations for the United States courts which the present House will have to provide for do not exceed $1,000,000. If any gentleman will take this book which I hold in my hand, he will find that the deficiencies for United States courts heretofore have amounted to largely more than the deficiencies which the present House will have to appropriate. Now, for instance——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair must insist that the gentleman from Texas shall either make some motion or suggestion which the Chair can put to the committee.

Mr. REED. The gentleman from Texas is proceeding by unanimous consent, and very happily, I think.

Mr. NEILL. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask that the committee will——

Mr. REED. The gentleman asks for the regular order, and I hope we will have it, he asks for the regular order.

Mr. NEILL. I withdraw the demand for the regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws it.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that we now proceed to the consideration of the urgent deficiency bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. REED. One question——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the proposition and then will hear the gentleman from Maine. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the committee shall now proceed to the consideration of the bill known as the urgent deficiency bill. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. I object unless I can hear from the gentleman in charge of the bill some reasons for that course of procedure.

Mr. SAYERS. I make the request for the reason that there are several appropriation bills before it on the Calendar and it is quite important that this bill should be passed at this time.

Mr. REED. The public necessities require it, do they?

Mr. SAYERS. I think so.

Mr. REED. Well, this side of the House always yields to that consideration. [Derisive cries on the Democratic side.]

There being no objection, the Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, this is the first reading of the bill, as I understand.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the first reading of the bill.

The reading being concluded,

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, if there is no desire for general debate I ask that the committee proceed to consider the bill by paragraphs.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire to occupy a few minutes. This bill reported by the committee carries $1,237,255.66. It is reported as an urgent deficiency bill. Calling it a deficiency bill is in some respects misleading. It is a bill that is made necessary by insufficient appropriations made during the last Congress, known to be insufficient when they were made, known to be insufficient for the public service in branches of it where the service must cease unless the money is appropriated. Therefore the bill might properly be called "additional appropriations for the public service for the current year where expenditures are not allowed unless appropriations are previously made." There is a class of expenditures that the law calls for, liabilities for which can be incurred in certain instances, whether the money has been appropriated or not; but this bill does not apply to that class. Those items will follow later, in the regular deficiency bill, but I believe nothing is included in this bill except matters where additional appropriations are necessary in order to have the public service continued.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The history of urgent deficiency bills in this Congress is peculiar. Ordinarily heretofore—in the Fifty-first Congress especially, but quite generally heretofore—an urgent deficiency bill has been passed by Congress before the regular deficiency bill came up, but in this Congress we began early with urgent deficiencies and have broken the record. Number 1 of these urgent deficiency bills was enacted on the 7th day of last September and carried $306,000. Number 2, for assistant custodians, janitors, etc., was enacted on the 21st day of last December and carried $370,588. Number 3, for the customs service, census, etc., was enacted on the 21st day of last December and carried $1,889,455.86. Number 4, for the United States courts and various other items, was enacted on the 12th day of last March and carried $768,278; and now comes number 5, carrying, as reported from the committee, for the Printing and Engraving Bureau, the courts, and the War, Navy, and Treasury, $1,237,555.66; making a total of urgent deficiencies, or more properly speaking, additional appropriations for the current fiscal year of $4,571,577.52.

It would be well enough for gentlemen to understand that if there is no additional deficiency appropriation bill for service during the current year where the law does not call for the service with or without appropriations the service will stop. I think it is fair that gentlemen should know on this side, and for that matter on the other side also, that they ought to examine this bill and see whether they know of any branch of the service that reasonably requires additional appropriation and for which such appropriation should be made rather than have the service stop for the remainder of this fiscal year. It may be that number 6 of these urgent deficiency bills will come in later. I do not know, but I should think it probable that it would not.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Do I understand the gentleman to say that in all probability there will be no further deficiency bill? The reason I ask the question is this: I have quite a number of constituents who have performed service for the Government; as, for instance, in the survey of the public lands. The work has been performed about a year and has been approved at the Land Office, but the money has lapsed into the Treasury, and the men who have done the work can not get their pay except by a deficiency bill.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The gentleman at the head of the committee can speak more certainly about this matter than I can. This bill, I will say to the gentleman, only carries appropriations for the public service for the remainder of this fiscal year where the public service would stop if the appropriations were not made.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Referring to page 4 of the bill, I find a paragraph entitled "Public land service" appropriating $25,000. This is not a case where the service would stop if the appropriation were not made, because this particular service seems to have been already performed. I do not see why in connection with this service an appropriation should be made for paying rent. The Government in no other instance of this kind pays rent. This appears to be an appropriation for clerk hire, rent, and other incidental expenses connected with opening up the Cherokee Outlet, a matter which has already been appropriated for (and this continues the appropriation) by the deficiency act approved December 21, 1893.

Mr. SAYERS. This is only to authorize——

Mr. WILSON of Washington. The expenditure of the money?

Mr. SAYERS. No, sir.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. What is it for?

Mr. SAYERS. It authorizes the auditing of the accounts connected with expenditures already made; that is all.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. An appropriation in these exact terms—for payment of expenses connected with the opening of the Cherokee Strip—was made in the act of December 21, 1893. The Department detailed a number of clerks and sent them out in connection with the land service. The object of this item, as I understand, is to utilize that appropriation for the payment of those clerks, their payment being fairly contemplated in the appropriation made in the former bill.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. That part is correct; but this appropriation goes further and says, "For clerk hire, rent, and other incidental expenses."

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Oh, certainly.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Now, I contend that the Department had no right to depart from the uniform practice and allow rent for land offices in the Cherokee Outlet.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. When that item is reached the gentleman, if he thinks it subject to a point of order, can of course raise that point.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Rent has never been allowed under similar circumstances anywhere else.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I am not defending the appropriation. While I think it probable it is apt and proper, I have no objection to its going out on a point of order or being stricken out on a vote.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I contend that if the Secretary of the Interior or the Commissioner of the General Land Office allows rent for United States land offices in the Cherokee Outlet, he has the same right and is in duty bound to allow rent to registers and receivers in Oregon, Washington, Nebraska, or wherever else they may be located. But in no instance where the office is a maximum office—that is to say, where it returns fees amounting to as much as $3,000—is the register or receiver allowed rent. And that being so, rent ought not to be allowed in this case.

I bring up this matter for the purpose of showing that whenever any opportunity is given to the Commissioner of the General Land Office or the Secretary of the Interior to give something to the people down South, the opportunity is always embraced; but when the matter involves simply the people in my part of the country, no such allowance is made.

Mr. McRAE. Do you call the Cherokee Strip "South"?

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. McRAE. You do not know the geography of your own country.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I know as much about my country as the gentleman from Arkansas does.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I will say that it is no part of my purpose to defend the administration of the Secretary of the Interior. Hot weather is coming on, and I do not want to shoulder any heavy burdens. At any rate that duty does not fall upon me. There is much in this Administration that is, I apprehend, subject to very severe censure; so that I do not know but I shall strengthen the arms of my friend from Washington or hold up his hands as certain Israelites held up the hands of Joshua——

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I think it was Joshua in my Bible. [Laughter.] The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] who sits beside me says that they held up the hands of Moses.

Mr. REED. That settles it.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Well, let it be Moses. The object was that he should have strength while he was smiting the Philistines or the Canaanites. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. The Malachites.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have no objection to any fighting that my friend may do; I think there is ample room for it. And I will say I am delighted to be able to verify the fact that my colleagues here in the House are so familiar with the history of the Lord's chosen people as recorded in the Old Testament.

There are some amendments, as I understand it, to be moved to this bill, when we come to the consideration of it by paragraphs, in connection with the work of the Census Bureau. Perhaps some other amendments adding other items will be presented. The gentleman from Texas has them in charge and they can be discussed when they are offered.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that I desire to state anything more touching the bill at this time. It carries not a very large amount of money, but added to the bills heretofore passed, the regular bills for the service of this fiscal year, and the deficiency bills heretofore passed, and those that are to follow, it is evident to the intelligent student of this question, touching the appropriations and expenditures of money by the people of the United States, that this Government and this country is growing.

I suspect that we have nearly 70,000,000 people now. I did think possibly at the close of the Fifty-first Congress, when I had the honor to be chairman of this committee, and after it had made recommendations for the public service according to the best of its ability, and after they had been considered in the grand aggregate all told, definite and indefinite, including the Post-Office appropriation, amounting up to nearly a thousand millions of dollars—I thought then that perhaps the criticism that was received from the other side of the House, under the leadership of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], and by the Democratic press throughout the length and breadth of the land, that we had come to a time when the population of this country would cease to increase and the country would cease to grow, and that from the expiration of that Congress on, at least for the rest of this century, there would be no increase of expenditures, but rather a decrease.

That was the natural inference to be drawn from their assertions. But, strange to say, with our friends on the other side coming in with the Fifty-second Congress, and later on with their control of the Fifty-third Congress, somehow it appeared that the population was still increasing. Somehow or other, notwithstanding the hard times, notwithstanding the hundreds of thousands of men out of employment, notwithstanding the less amount that is being expended for the construction of the Navy, notwithstanding the great economy that our Democratic friends exercised, holding the purse strings of the country as they did in this House during the Fifty-second Congress—notwithstanding all of these facts, strange to say, in the Fifty-second Congress there was an increase, and this year the expenditures do not decrease.

The gentleman from Indiana made provision to decrease them absolutely, because under his leadership the appropriations were made for this and the last fiscal year. I was not in the last Congress, but read the debates and knew pretty well what was going on, as attention was called to the fact that there was going to be an era of economy and a great reduction in expenditures; and yet, strange to say, men are contrary enough throughout the length and breadth of the country to refuse to serve the Government unless they are paid for it. Still it is necessary that the Navy should be utilized in some manner. True, owing to the shortness of appropriations, or extravagance, whichever you choose to call it, many ships of our magnificent new Navy are tied up for want of repairs, absolutely as useless as if they had never been constructed. Still, notwithstanding all of these conditions, these expenses have continued to increase. And I suspect maybe that the country will still continue to grow.

I am not here to charge extravagance where the charge will not lie against this Congress and against this Democratic Administration, except where it ought to be criticised. I am not here merely to show that they have broken the record we made in the Fifty-first Congress, because that would be a cheap kind of buncombe, we made apt and proper appropriations. I call attention that under the lead of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON] the Post-Office appropriation bill this year breads the record of any since the Government was organized, notwithstanding it has been cut down many millions of dollars below what the service will cost, and confessedly so where the law calls for the service and the appropriation should be made.

Now, having said this much, I yield the remainder of the time to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it must be borne in mind that the basis for appropriations is laid by the heads of the various Departments of the Government. Under the law each Secretary makes estimates in advance of the fiscal year for the amount of money that will be required for his particular Department during the coming fiscal year. He bases that estimate upon his experience in the Department. He knows what it has cost in the past and what will be necessary to continue it in the future, and is therefore well qualified to enlighten Congress as to what appropriation should be made for its support. These estimates, made up by the heads of the Departments under the law, are sent to Congress through the Secretary of the Treasury, who, adding his own Department, makes up what is called the Book of Estimates for the information of Congress.

These estimates are made quite extensively and in detail. I make this statement for the information of those not on the Committee of Appropriations, to show that we have one strong guide to start with—the experience of the heads of the various Departments.

Now, there are two classes of people that need a little attention in connection with appropriations. Frequently I see statements made out of the deep fountain of ignorance in the large daily papers of the country, attacking the extravagance of Congress. That Congress does some, I might say many, extravagant things I will not deny; but the general assaults made by many of the leading journals of the country about the extravagance of Congress are not merited.

There is another class that need attention, and that class is composed of those legislators who, with a full blaze of light touching appropriations, take the paring knife and cut down below all reason, and in the face of absolute knowledge of what the future will demand.

Now, for the purpose of treating these two classes a little, I want to enter into a few of the details of this deficiency bill. The discussion that has already been had tells us that these are deficiencies for the current fiscal year, caused by the insufficiency of appropriations contained in our appropriation bills of last year for the fiscal year which ends on the 30th of June next. We are now confessing in this bill that we did not appropriate what was needed.

Now, in order to be perfectly fair, let me say that while we have the guidance of the estimates of the heads of the great Departments, still Congress is bound to exercise its judgment, and does so, and we can not always go to the extent of the recommendations of the heads of the Departments. Sometimes questions of policy are involved. Sometimes the question whether they can be compelled to do it for less is involved, and sometimes we cut in these appropriation bills when we know we are doing it a little too closely to the line, perhaps, for the purpose of warning the heads of these great Departments to practice economy; and I believe that every committee, Republican and Democratic, since my connection with this body, has gone to the extreme of economy in the main. I will not touch certain extravagances. I am not here entering into what might be termed a political discussion. That may come later on, when we come to sum up the work. Now, for the purpose of throwing a little light upon the details of this bill, the aggregate of which has been stated to you, I want to call your attention to a few items, and to show what the estimates were, what we appropriated last year for this year, and what we are compelled now to give, confessing that we did not give enough.

Take, for instance, the Treasury Department. In the matter of suppressing counterfeiting, this bill carries a deficiency of $10,000. How much did the Secretary of the Treasury estimate as the amount which would be needed? Seventy thousand dollars. We only gave $60,000. We cut $10,000 below the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, and this bill now brings it up to what was estimated by the Secretary. I give that as one instance.

Now, comes the Bureau of Printing and Engraving. For salaries of clerks and employés, the estimate for 1894 was $425,000. We gave $378,000. This bill carries $62,549 as a deficiency, which is $15,549 above the estimate of the Treasury Department as to what would be needed. I say that I believe that in the two cases now given we cut too closely to the line, and in that and many instances, I believe with my colleague from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] that the last Congress was trying to demonstrate that the Fifty-first Congress was extravagant, a demonstration that has most signally failed.

Now, come to the wages of plate printers, etc., in the Bureau of Printing and Engraving. The estimate of the Department was $538,500. We only gave $409,469. We are now compelled to come in and appropriate $72,665.92 in addition, bringing the appropriation above the estimate to the extent of $3,165.92.

Under the head of the War Department, for a vessel called the Nimrod, to be used in the harbor of New York to keep deposits cleared away, the estimate was $10,000. We shaved that $2,000. Here we come with a deficiency of $2,000, bringing it right up to the estimate. The Department could tell, within a very few dollars, what would be needed.

Come to the Interior Department. For postage to postal union countries with which we have agreements they asked $2,500. We sliced them $500. In this bill we give them $750, or $250 above the estimate. In that way we have to repair the effect of the pruning knife.

Now, take the work on this very Capitol. For general repairs, including wages of mechanics, laborers, etc. They asked $30,000, and we gave them $20,000. In this bill we give $8,000. We are compelled to come close up to the estimates of the Department.

Now, take the Department of Justice. For the expenses of Territorial courts in Utah Territory they asked $70,000, and made out a good case. We cut them down to $35,000. That was all we gave them. This bill carries that $35,000 which we refused to appropriate before, and brings it up to the estimates of the Department.

For deficiencies of Indian depredation claims they asked $30,000, and we gave them only $22,500. One deficiency bill has already given them $2,500, and this gives them $9,000 additional; so that we are $4,000 above the estimates of the Department.

Now for fees of jurors. I would like the members of Congress to give especial attention to this, for your districts are all interested; and since I have been in Congress we have seen the Federal courts at times compelled to stop business for the want of money to pay jurors and to carry on the business of the Federal courts. They asked $650,000. We gave them only $600,000, cutting them $50,000.

This bill carries that $50,000 we cut a year ago, and brings it up to the estimate. Take the support of United States prisoners. They asked for $450,000. We slashed them $150,000, only giving them $300,000. This bill carries $275,000 deficiency, $125,000 more than the Department asked. We knew well when we were making up the bill that it would be less than needed.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question there?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOUD. Does not this portrayal totally destroy the record of our economical Fifty-second Congress?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. The gentleman will have to draw his own conclusion. I am giving the facts.

Mr. LOUD. It makes me feel sad to see my record destroyed in this way

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Facts are "chiels that winna ding." I will give you the facts and you must make your own inference. Take the printing and binding. In the Department of Justice they asked $10,000 for printing. We slashed off $1,000. This bill gives that $1,000. Now, we will come to the House of of Representatives. I will confess that there is a matter where you can not always foresee amounts needed; but you will see that the Committee on Appropriations errs on the safe side in keeping down the appropriations, especially if they want to draw a comparison with the past. Take the miscellaneous items first. They asked for $20,000, and we gave them $20,000. We have heretofore given $28,000 deficiency, and this carries $2,500, so that we are $30,500 above the estimates for that alone. Take furniture. They asked $12,000, and we only gave them $9,000. They have had $2,500 in another urgent deficiency bill, and now we give them $1,500; so that we have $1,000 above the estimate; to say nothing about the appropriations for material for folding, and that is pretty hard to estimate, because we can not tell how many speeches we are going to blow off during the session; but we kept pretty safe. They estimated for $17,000, we gave them $10,000. Already we have given them $5,000 in another urgency deficiency bill, and this carries $10,500 more; being $14,500 above the estimates.

Now, I call attention to these few items in detail in this little urgency deficiency bill so that you can see how this thing works. And this, as I said at the opening, will reach two classes of men that say we are extravagant, when we are in fact cutting down below what we ought to give and have got to come in and repair it or the wheels of the Government stop; and the class of men who condemn the Fifty-first Congress because we did not do well enough, and they can not do as well to save their souls.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I believe I have a little time left. At the proper time, near the close of this Congress, when the appropriations made by the first and second sessions of this Congress are completed, I have no doubt that a full statement will be made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] of the aggregate result, and that a statement will be made by somebody on our side of the House, and by such other members of the House as desire to make statements. Until that time comes, the work of this session of Congress can not be fully and intelligently criticised as to appropriations. I will await that time before I seek to make the statement, if I make it at all.

Now, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN]—and I speak respectfully, because I have served many years with him in this House—with all his ability and devotion to the public service, is as apt as any man I know to play the cuttlefish, and after he has muddied the water, to swim away. [Laughter.] He has criticised the Fifty-first Congress, when I had the honor to be chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Now, all the appropriations made in the Fifty-first Congress were not good. All the appropriations of any Congress have not been good, and never will be. There were appropriations in that Congress that I combated with all the feeble power that I had, and some of them amounting to a good many millions of dollars. I have one in mind which in my judgment was vicious, and I will so say to the gentleman from Indiana

I refer to the claim of three millions of dollars in round numbers, the money that was appropriated to pay what was called the Choctaw claim. If I recollect correctly, that was carried through this House near the close of the session, late at night. It was carried against the most determined opposition that I could make, and the great majority of this side of the House stood with me in opposing it. The other side of the House stood substantially a unit in favor of it, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] himself, who is a watchman upon the tower touching expenditures, as gentlemen will see by examining the RECORD, was neither paired, nor did he vote for or against the appropriation. Since that time much criticism has been made of this appropriation. The President of the United States refused to expend it, and it was not expended until long afterward, when the Fifty-third Congress, two thirds of the House being Democratic, directed its expenditure by another act. Now, that is an appropriation in which I had no pride.

But after all is said and done, having replied to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] touching his manner of presenting this question, I will not take my seat without saying that substantially the appropriations of the Fifty-first Congress were clean and liberal.

The Republicans believe that whatever is worth doing should be well done, and that true economy abounds in liberal, not extravagant or parsimonious appropriation of money for the public service.

Mr. DINGLEY. I did not intend to make any remarks with reference to the subject which has been launched upon the House, but some statements have been made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] which I can not allow to go uncontradicted.

This question of appropriations by the Fifty-first and Fifty-second Congresses was gone over thoroughly in the last Congress, and at the close the simple result, as officially stated by the clerk of the committee, was found to be that the appropriations by the Fifty-first Congress were $988,417,183 and by the Fifty-second Congress $1,027,104,547, or $38,637,364 more by the Fifty-second than the Fifty-first Congress.

But in determining the expenditures of this Government, statements of total appropriations by any Congress afford very little light. When estimating appropriations you may proceed upon the basis of including all appropriations, both for deficiencies and otherwise, or you may deduct deficiencies at one end and fail to add them at the other, or you may deduct at one end and appropriately add them at the other. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has pursued the course of deducting from the appropriations of the Fifty-second Congress all appropriations for deficiencies for previous fiscal years, and has omitted to add the necessary deficiencies at the other end.

Now, I am not now disposed to spend any time on this question of comparative appropriations by different Congresses. I think that whatever the Congress may be, whether of one party or the other, the appropriations for the most part are only such as are necessary for carrying on the Government properly, and completing the particular permanent public works that may be undertaken at that particular period. When there are no permanent public works being carried on, and no appropriations therefor, the appropriations, of course, decline. When the Government is building a new Navy, is erecting fortifications, is enlarging its river and harbor improvements, is purchasing lands from Indians afterwards to be sold to actual settlers, is constructing a large number of public buildings, all permanent works, necessarily the appropriations and the expenditures increase.

Mr. PAYNE. The refund of direct taxes to the States.

Mr. DINGLEY. The refund of direct taxe to the States, as the gentleman from New York says, is an appropriation once for all time. There are times when certain expenditures are made that do not occur at other periods. In the decennial year, for example, there is an expenditure of $10,000,000 for taking the decennial census. It happened in 1893 we had a World's Exposition at Chicago, and the Government undertook to aid that exposition. So there was an appropriation for it. That was necessarily added to the other expenditures. There was a large increase in expenditures for pensions during certain years.

Now, when these permanent works are entered upon, and payments for pensions are enlarged, inevitably there is an increase both of appropriations and expenditures; but for the ordinary work of the Government there is little difference from year to year, except such as grows out of the increase in population and enlargement of the public objects undertaken. You may take any of the recent years after the close of the war, and deduct the expenditures growing out of the war, such as pensions, bounty, and back pay, and payment of certain war claims, and you will find that the expenditures run along year by year, per inhabitant, with great similarity. It is only when we extend our operations and enlarge the expenditures on permanent works that these appropriations run up.

The Fifty-first Congress undertook to make appropriations for certain important permanent works. We were building a new navy, we were entering upon a system of coast fortifications, we were enlarging somewhat our expenditures for rivers and harbors; were purchasing a large quantity of land from the Indians to be resold to settlers, and we were constructing public buildings. When permanent work is done of course appropriations are increased, and when Congress refuses to enter upon any public works, why of course the expenditures go down. But that has nothing to do with the question of economy. These public works are to be done at some time, and when undertaken the bills must be paid.

Now, one further remark with reference to the question of appropriations. When the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] was at the head of the Committee on Appropriations the distinct policy which he pursued, from beginning to end, was to appropriate less for the current work of the Government than he knew, and every member of the Committee on Appropriations knew, would be required, in order to cut down the apparent figures of the appropriations for the current year, in the face of the fact that everybody knew that the reduction would have to be made good in deficiency bills of the succeeding year. Now, all of that amounts to nothing. You may deceive some persons outside of this House, but you will not deceive them long; and we shall not deceive ourselves by such a process as that. If we desire to compare the relative expenditures from year to year we shall not compare the appropriations. The appropriation may be made and not used; it may be larger than is found ultimately to be required for the purpose; and it may be less and necessitate a deficiency appropriation in the succeeding year.

Now, the test of economy, if you are going to apply it at all, in disregard of the permanent work or exceptional objects subserved, is in the expenditures. If you will follow the expenditures from year to year you will find that, setting aside those expenditures that grew out of the war, such as pensions, back pay, bounty, etc., there has been very little change, as I have already said, except when these great public permanent works were entered upon.

How is it as to the present fiscal year, nine months of which have expired? A great deal was said in the last Congress by the gentleman from Indiana about how he was going to reduce the expenditures for the present fiscal year, when a Democratic Senate and a Democratic Administration would be in. Well, we have had a Democratic Administration and a Congress Democratic in both Houses now all through the present fiscal year, nine months of which have expired. How do the expenditures stand?

I have before me the official statement of expenditures from July 1 last to April 1 of the present year. Here are the expenditures for the first three quarters, or nine months of the present fiscal year, as compared with the nine months of the last fiscal year, when it was said that there was so much extravagance. Outside of pensions the expenditures in nine months of the present fiscal year, beginning July 1 and ending April 1, are over $1,000,000 more than they were last year for the same period. There has been a reduction of about $13,000,000 in the amount of expenditures, but it has all been in the reduction of pensions. Fourteen million dollars have been cut off from the boys in blue for pensions, and if any credit is to be taken for having saved money, there, and there only it has been done; the expenditures in every other direction have increased.

Mr. GEAR. It was suggested in the beginning that this Administration was going to save $20,000,000 by reductions in pensions.

Mr. DINGLEY. That will be done the present year, if it can be called saving. There will be twenty millions, or at least eighteen millions less paid to the boys in blue in this fiscal year for pensions than was paid last year, and here is where all the so called saving is found. We all know how that has been done; at least I know how it has been done in my district. We all know of the many deserving men who have had their pensions suspended, and of the delay that is occurring in the adjudication of pension claims, and if there is any credit to be taken for the reduction of expenditures, let it be taken just at the point where it belongs and nowhere else. There has not been a dollar of reduction anywhere else, but, on the contrary, there has been an increase.

Mr. Chairman, I should not have brought up this question if the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] had not undertaken to make some political capital out of the great "economy" which he practiced last year. There was no economy. There was simply an attempt to deceive the country by appropriating less than the gentleman himself knew would be required to meet the necessary expenditures of the Government. Why, sir, for all the great purposes of Government we can not change the expenditures unless we change the laws. The expenditures go on whether we appropriate or not. The gentleman from Indiana last year cut the appropriation for the Federal courts $250,000 below what he knew would be necessary, but that appropriation comes in this year as a deficiency, and if we should now do as he did then, the result would be the same.

Is there any saving? He had all the credit of the saving last year, and now he is not willing to take account of the deficiency which we are called upon to appropriate for at this time. Why, my friends, there is nothing in all these suggestions of economy which have been made by reducing appropriations for necessary objects of Government. When we get through, no matter what may be your appropriations, the expenditures of this Government for all ordinary purposes will go on at substantially the same rate, no matter what party is in power, and all this attempt to make capital out of the appropriations by appropriating less than the necessities of the Government demand is simple nonsense.

Now, I want to say before I sit down—and I say it to the credit of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS], the present chairman of the Committee on Appropriations—that there has been no attempt on his part, so far as I have observed, to repeat the deceptive operations to which I have alluded. There has been an honest endeavor on his part to appropriate what seemed to be required to meet the real necessities of the Government, and there has been no attempt to play politics with appropriation bills. That, I think, should be said to his credit. It is other gentlemen who have attempted to drag in and claim great credit for the kind of "economy" which I have described.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Texas did not report the Post-Office appropriation bill, and the remark of the gentleman from Maine does not apply to that.

Mr. DINGLEY. He did not report that bill. Let me say that my remark applies to the appropriation bills which come under the gentleman's charge and the other bills that are under the charge of the Committee on Appropriations. It does not apply at all to some of the other appropriation bills that have been reported here containing amounts which are known to be less than will be required to meet the necessary current expenditures of the Government.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to dissent from anything which has been said by my colleague [Mr. DINGLEY] with regard to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I do wish the House would give a little bit of consideration to the significance of the debate which has taken place today. No charge is made that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN], as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, permitted himself to indulge in unsuitable appropriations. Whether he did or not is beyond my ken, but there is no charge of that sort, and, so far as I have heard, there is no suspicion of it.

The point involved is this. The gentleman from Indiana and his friends, the gentlemen upon the other side, day in and day out, denounced the Fifty-first Congress as a spendthrift Congress and delighted themselves with calling it a "billion-dollar Congress." They commenced the Fifty-second Congress, of which they had control, with a scene in which they passed a pious self-denying ordinance, announcing that they were in favor of economy, and then they proceeded with one accord to get up appropriation bills which surpassed in amount the appropriation bills which those same gentlemen had so vigorously denounced from every stump.

The point at issue here is not the propriety of the appropriations in either case. The point is as to the moral dishonesty, if I may use such a term without offense—and I do not mean to be offensive—the moral impropriety, of declaiming on the stump against appropriations made by men of another party and then going into the business yourselves and making still larger appropriations. There is the gist of the charge. We have pretty well cleared the skirts of the Fifty-first Congress of a certain class of charges that were made against it, and now it seem appropriate that we should take up another set.

The charge was continually made, reiterated and reiterated again, that the Fifty-first Congress was extravagant, and yet the man who led in that charge himself, as chairman of a Committee on Appropriations, contrived to pass a more enormous set of appropriations than those against which he had declaimed. I want to get the idea into his mind that for a man to charge another man with crime in doing a thing which he afterwards repeats himself to excess is unsuitable. [Laughter.] I do not know whether I can make the impression upon his mind that I desire to make or not. I want to make the impression not only upon his mind, but upon the minds of his party, so that they may live in a certain degree cleanly hereafter, and not permit themselves, when the next Republican Congress comes in, to indulge in the kind of talk which has so discredited them with the community in times past. [Laughter.] In other words, I want them to learn the lesson that mere abuse is in time discovered and denounced, and it reflects discredit upon the abusers. Now, if by any means—by careful iteration and reiteration—that idea can be brought home to them, the politics of this country will be so much the purer.

The gentleman from Indiana undertakes to make up a lot of figures. He has tried it so many times that I have the charity to believe he will some time or other credit them himself if he keeps on. [Laughter.] Again and again he has eliminated this set of figures and that set of figures; he has tried all the expedients which have been denounced by my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] and depicted by the gentleman from Iowa. Yet the plain fact remains that the appropriations in the Congress in which he was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations were greater than those in the Congress whose appropriations he so bitterly denounced.

Now, if he and his friends would come up manfully, acknowledge they had been mistaken, say they were wrong, or if they would even exhibit the penitence of silence, we would be reasonably satisfied with them, because it would be assurance of good conduct in the future—a shining contrast with their conduct in the past. [Laughter.] In time we shall bring them to it. In time we shall bring them to a full private acknowledgment on the subject, as we have done upon the matter of a quorum and the rules of the Fifty-first Congress. They will do it privately; they will do everything except make a public acknowledgment. What is really good for their souls is a public admission. [Laughter.] I had entertained the hope that they might make it some time or other.

A MEMBER. That is hoping too much.

Mr. REED. Well, it is only a slight hope. I do not want to be blamed for it. It arises out of the welling charity of my nature; [laughter] the disposition to think kindly even of those who have "despitefully used us and persecuted us." [Laughter.] But the world is beginning to understand the matter; and when the gentleman from Indiana (who is entitled to be in the forefront on this occasion) gets up and undertakes to hugger-mugger with the figures, the country is beginning to understand it; and even some members of the House of Representatives are beginning to catch hold of it.

Why not just frankly say, "Yes, we were wrong in making this assault on you; we were excited, stirred up, disturbed in our minds; something had happened that we did not want to happen: we felt exasperated, and we went around and said all sorts of loose and unkindly things." Now, let us go on hereafter upon a different basis; and when the next Republican Congress takes control and does its duty by the country fairly and faithfully, let us have at least a reasonable degree of judicious silence on the other side, remembering what has happened to you when you broke silence. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SAYERS. Now that gentlemen have spoken who desire to speak, I ask unanimous consent that general debate be considered as closed.

The CHAIRMAN. In the absence of objection general debate will be regarded as closed.

There was no objection.

Mr. SAYERS. I now ask that the bill be read by paragraphs for amendment.

The Clerk, proceeding to read the bill, read the following:

Public Land Service: That all the traveling and incidental expenses of the clerks detailed from the General Land Office to assist in the opening of the Cherokee Outlet, in Oklahoma Territory, shall be paid from the sum of $25,000, for clerk hire, rent, and other incidental expenses of the several land offices, appropriated by deficiency act approved December 21, 1893.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I have a very important amendment to offer by authority of the subcommittee, and ask the attention of the committee while it is being read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of page 4 insert the following:

"ELEVENTH CENSUS.

"The Commissioner of Labor in charge of the Eleventh Census is hereby directed to prepare forthwith an abstract giving the State and other totals of the main facts collected at the Eleventh Census with comparative data, which abstract shall not exceed 250 octavo pages and shall be printed at the Government Printing Office and be ready for distribution on or before the 1st day of August next. There shall be printed and bound in cloth of such abstract 100,000 copies, of which 60,000 copies shall be for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, 30,000 copies for the use of the members of the Senate, 7,500 copies for the use of the Department of the Interior, and 2,500 copies for the use of the Census Office.

"The provisions of section 17 of the act of Congress approved March 1, 1889, entitled, 'An act to provide for the taking of the Eleventh and subsequent censuses,' and of subsequent acts relating to the publication of the names, organizations, and length of service of those who had served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the war of the rebellion and who were survivors at the time of the Eleventh Census, and of the widows of soldiers, sailors, or marines at that time, are hereby repealed, and the Commissioner of Labor in charge of the Eleventh Census is hereby directed to transfer to the Commissioner of Pensions, for use in the Army and Navy survivors' division, the special schedules collected at the Eleventh Census, containing such names, organizations, and length of service.

"He is also authorized to bind the report on Fish and Fisheries with the Report on Agriculture, instead of as a separate volume, as provided for in 'An act to provide for the publication of the Eleventh Census,' approved February 23, 1893.

"The provision of the act entitled 'An act to provide for the taking of the Eleventh and subsequent censuses,' approved March 1, 1889, for the collection from official sources of information relating to animals not on farms, is hereby repealed.

"The time provided in the act entitled 'An act to extend the time for completing the work of the Eleventh Census and for other purposes,' approved October 3, 1893, is hereby extended from the 30th day of June, 1894, to and including the 4th day of March, 1895."

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I should like to have the attention of gentlemen on both sides while I explain briefly the amendment which I have just offered. The amendment has been submitted to the Acting Superintendent of the Census, and has the unanimous indorsement of the subcommittee in charge of the deficiency bill.

During the present session of Congress the time for the abolishment of the Census Bureau was extended to the 1st of July next. But upon consultation with the Acting Superintendent of the Census we were advised that it would be absolutely impossible to complete that work by the 1st day of July, and he recommended, and the subcommittee in charge of the deficiency bill also recommend to this Committee that the time should be extended to the 4th day of March next. The Acting Superintendent of the Census informs us that, with the exception of proofreading, all of the work of the census will certainly be completed by that date.

Another paragraph in the amendment directs that the Superintendent of the Census shall prepare an abstract of the Eleventh Census, to consist of not more than 250 pages. No gentleman present would undertake to go through the entire census reports for the purpose of gathering the information which they contain. They will be very large volumes, some amounting to more than a thousand pages; and the object of the abstract is to print only such matters as are of prime importance, so that they may be easily accessible to members of Congress and to whomever they may be sent. We believe that this clause should be adopted, because it will not only facilitate the publication and distribution of these important facts, growing out of the taking of the census, but also because they will come in so convenient a form as will make them more accessible.

There is another clause of the amendment to which I will call the attention of the committee. In the original act directing the taking of the census a provision was made requiring the enumeration of all those who served in the Union Army during the late civil war, and also of the surviving widows of such soldiers. It is believed now, in fact the Acting Superintendent of the Census so advised us, that in order to publish the names and give their addresses seven large volumes of about a thousand pages each would be required, costing near $250,000. Now it is recommended by the Superintendent of the Census, and by the committee, that the Superintendent of the Census be required to deliver to the Pension Office all the names that have been taken, with their addresses, etc., so that the Pension Office may be able to utilize the work that has been done.

There was another provision in the original act, Mr. Chairman, which required that a census of all animals not upon farms should also be taken. We are informed that it has been impossible to comply with this provision; and that the census thus far had of animals not belonging to farms, or upon farms has been very incomplete; and that the officials of the different counties and States have not been able to furnish the Census Office with the information asked of them upon the subject. So we recommend the repeal of that clause in the original act.

The final clause provides that the report on fish and fisheries should be incorporated in the report on agriculture. It was first intended that the report on fish and fisheries should be published as a separate volume. But the former Superintendent of the Census was unable to gather statistics upon the subject of fish and fisheries that would amount to more than fifty or sixty pages, if printed, and the committee thought it an unnecessary and unwise expenditure of the public money to publish this small report in a separate volume. We therefore recommend in this amendment that the report on fish and fisheries, amounting, as I have said, to not more than fifty or sixty pages, shall be incorporated with the report on agriculture.

Mr. GROUT. Was that with the consent of the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries?

Mr. SAYERS. We did not consult the Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, because he has nothing to do with the taking of the census.

Now, I yield to my friend from Illinois, if he desires to say anything upon the subject.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Perhaps I can ask a question or two of my friend from Texas, and we can discuss certain facts connected with one or two matters in a conversational way, better than for me to make a speech upon the subject.

Touching the abstract of not exceeding 250 pages, the gentleman from Texas speaks of——

Mr. GROUT. Is that what is ordinarily known as the Compendium?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. No. The Compendium will consist of three volumes, and probably two or three years will expire before it will be completed.

Mr. SAYERS. And some six or seven hundred pages to the volume.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. There is an abstract authorized by law not yet completed; and my recollection is in accord with that of the gentleman from Texas, that the abstract now provided for by law would require certain reports yet to be perfected; and it is not practicable to get it ready before the 1st day of January next.

Mr. SAYERS. That accords with my recollection.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Further, I believe, if I recollect aright, that Mr. Wright—Mr. Carroll D. Wright, in charge of the Bureau—stated that this abstract would be practically as useful as the one that is to come in January.

Mr. SAYERS. I so understood him.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. And that there would be only slight additions on rather unimportant reports.

I concur in what the gentleman from Texas has said, and state further that the 1st of August next is the shortest time within which he said he could get the proposed abstract, ready but he said he could get it ready by that time, so that it could not only be prepared but could be printed and bound and put in the folding room by that time. That gives the members of Congress and the people at large practical possession of the important matters to be embodied in these twenty or twenty-one reports, three of which have been published and the remainder of which will be published in the next two or three or four years. In other words, this will give us the result of the late census and a comparative statement as well, by the 1st of August, for use in this life.

Mr. PICKLER. How many copies do you provide for?

Mr. SAYERS. One hundred thousand copies, 60,000 for the use of the House, 30,000 for the use of the Senate, and 10,000 for the use of the Departments.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If I am correct in my recollection, the cost of this abstract will be 25 cents per copy, bound. That is, the 100,000 copies will cost $25,000.

Mr. SAYERS. Let me say here that the material in the abstract which is to be first published will be used as a part of the material of the abstract already authorized.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. That is correct.

Mr. SAYERS. So that really the expense of it does not amount to $25,000 exclusively.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have no doubt in the world about the exceeding value of this abstract, and the wisdom of this amendment that the gentleman proposes.

Now, one other matter that the gentleman refers to, that I will be glad to have a little more fully stated. That is the repeal of the portion of the census law requiring the publication of the names of the soldiers of the late war and their widows.

Mr. SAYERS. I will state to my friend that I intended to leave the explanation of that paragraph to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] makes the explanation, I will not pursue that matter, except to say that I am in harmony with the amendment, which was recommended by Mr. Wright, and it seems to me the reasons for it are sufficient, and that the amendment is wise. I do not know that I desire to say anything further if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] will cover that point.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, it is proper that the House should understand this amendment affecting the soldiers. The census law now contemplates the publication of a number of volumes giving the names, service, and residence of the soldiers of the late war, and members of the Navy and the Marine Service, and the names of the widows and their location at the time the census was taken.

In making these data some of the enumerators omitted a great deal of information that should have been taken. In many instances the residence was given, and not the regiment and company to which a soldier belonged. It would require a vast amount of correspondence to perfect this. A great deal of correspondence has been conducted on the part of the Pension Office in trying to complete these data.

The object of the original legislation was twofold. I remember participating in it to some extent. The double purpose was that the lawmakers and the Pension Office could know how many survivors there were, and where they were located, and this further motive governed the soldiers who advocated this matter, viz, to get the information by which one soldier seeking to prove his claim could find out where a bunk mate or comrade was located, so that he could correspond with him to get the affidavit that he might need in order to perfect his claim. These two considerations governed Congress in putting that enactment into law as a part of the fundamental law of the Eleventh Census.

Now we find that it will probably be two years before this will be perfected. It will take seven large volumes, costing from $225,000 to $250,000, an item of expense, however, which the committee will not hesitate to incur if, when done, the work would meet the end for which the original legislation was enacted; but so many soldiers have died, so many have changed their residences, and so imperfect are the data, and it will be so long before the information will become at all useful, that it will utterly fail of the purpose for which it was enacted.

In the Pension Office there is a special division that has charge of looking up the records and residences of the survivors of the late war. They have accomplished a great deal in that direction. I recall many instances where I wrote to the Pension Office and tried to get the residence of soldiers to help out some correspondent, and I never yet failed to get the name and the residence, and any member here in the House who has had a similar experience will, I think, sustain me.

Now this amendment will put all the data that the Census Office has immediately into the hands of the Pension Office and of that division, and we require them in that amendment to utilize it to perfect that record. By this means, therefore, we attain the end originally sought at once, and at the same time save the Government an expense of $225,000 to $250,000. I want to say that those upon the subcommittee and the committee have unanimously recommended this to the House. I have consulted quite a number of soldiers of the House, and all are in accord with the expression that this is the wise thing to do.

Passing from that point, I want to say a word about the census matter. I had some confusion as to what rights we had as to documents for distribution; and yesterday, when we had Gen. Wright before us, I pressed him a little on this point. I find we will have twenty-four large volumes of the census when completed, which, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] says, will be two to four years hence. Three of them are now ready for distribution.

Mr. WALKER. How many copies of each will we have?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. It varies. On some the number is 10,000 copies, and in some 50,000 are authorized to be printed.

Mr. WALKER. Of each book?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. There are different numbers on different volumes. Three of these are now ready for distribution; and if you designate the library or a county auditor's office these will now be sent under your designation. And those three are the only documents that are now ready for distribution, except the first volume of the Compendium, or ready for the orders of members of Congress. In addition to that, we will have the Compendium, consisting of three volumes, which will be quite heavy and cumbersome, but a condensation of these great quarto volumes. This Compendium will not be ready, except as just stated, for a long time.

Now, this is all fixed by the original law. In addition to that we will have a digest of the census, but that will not be ready for some time to come. It will be two or three years hence before the digest is ready. All the data must be compiled before that is completed. In addition to that there is to be an atlas with shaded indications of the development of the country. That will be something attractive to the eye and desirable to libraries, and give a sort of condensation of that feature of the census. These will include all that we will finally have under the law. All of them are far from completion, except the four volumes now ready.

This abstract which we have provided for in this bill will give in a nutshell, in a little volume of 250 pages, the meat of the Eleventh Census; and it will be on your desks, ready for distribution, on the 1st of July next. My judgment is that this little abstract will furnish the information of the census which will be most desired. The other great volumes, when they come out, will be for students and statisticians, and for the editor to take and delve in them, and so will the statesman and politician, if such a distinction exists. But it is the little abstract you want to fight for, for it will contain almost everything you need.

Mr. SAYERS. I now ask for a vote on the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HULICK. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SAYERS. Certainly.

Mr. HULICK. I understand you propose to extend the period of operation of this department until the 1st of March next?

Mr. SAYERS. Until the 4th of March next.

Mr. HULICK. To what extent will the clerical force of the Census department be affected? Will it be reduced?

Mr. SAYERS. It will be reduced as the work is completed between now and the 4th of March. The law now requires a reduction of the force as the work is being finished: but the Superintendent of the Census said it was of exceedingly great importance, and that it would be a grave error not to provide in this bill for the extension of the time until the 4th of March next.

Mr. HULICK. I understand that under the law as it now stands the clerical force will be practically disbanded on the 1st of July. Am I correct?

Mr. SAYERS. Yes; but we propose to extend the time.

Mr. HULICK. The amendment you suggest will extend that to the 4th of March, the same as if no provision in the present law affected the clerical force.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. HULICK. Then those in the department can rest assured that there will be no radical change in the clerical force until the 4th of March. [Laughter.]

Mr. TUCKER. We will want to have a hearing on that.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to a paragraph in this amendment. It is that which proposes to bind the report of the Fish and Fishery Commission with the Agricultural Report. This, I think, is a movement in a right direction. A bill has been introduced and is now pending which purposes to transfer the Fish Commission to the Agricultural Department. I think every member of the House and of the committee who will give the matter a moment's thought will easily reach the conclusion that this Fish and Fisheries Commission should be transferred to that Department.

Mr. SAYERS. I will state to my friend that the amendment does not propose anything affecting the Fish Commission. It simply requires that the statistics and information gathered by the Superintendent of the Census shall be published in the report of the Department of Agriculture instead of being published separately.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Very properly; and I do not seek to antagonize that proposition. On the contrary, the observations I am making will give some additional reasons why that should be done. Now, Mr. Chairman, that Commission of Fish and Fisheries has to do with a great food product, it has to do with the propagation and distribution of animal life, and this being so the Commission should be transferred to the Department of Agriculture. Such being the case, it is highly proper that this committee anticipate somewhat this action and give to the farmers, among whom the agricultural reports mainly circulate, the benefit of reports of this Commission. I trust the committee will bear this in mind and that when the bill is reported, as I trust it will be soon, that transfer will be made. A similar bill has been favorably reported by two committees of the Senate, and I trust that the House will approve the proposition.

The amendment offered by Mr. SAYERS was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For printing and binding, including materials therefor, to be executed at the Government Printing Office, as follows:

Mr. SAYERS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After line 10 insert:
"For the Department of State, $5,000."

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH, from the Committee of the Whole, reported that they had had under consideration a bill (H. R. 6556) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year 1894, and for other purposes, had made sundry amendments thereto, and had directed him to report the bill as amended to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the amendments and the bill to its passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were agreed to. The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SAYERS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of general appropriation bills. The Clerk will report the unfinished business.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6016) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895.

"OFFICE OF THE SECOND ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

"For inland mail transportation, namely: Inland transportation by star routes, $6,000,000."

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

At the end of line 20, page 3, add:

"Provided, That the Postmaster-General, when application is made for such purpose, and under such regulations as he shall establish, may authorize the placing of private mail boxes along the line of any inland mail route; and when such boxes are established, the mail-carriers over such routes shall deposit therein the mail of such persons as are authorized and desire to use such boxes, and receive such mail as is found therein duly stamped for mailing, and deliver the same to the postmaster of the nearest post-office on his route, or at the beginning or terminus thereof, who shall mail the same as soon as practicable.

"Such mail boxes shall be erected without expense to the United States, and for the privilege hereby authorized the persons using such mail boxes shall pay to such postmaster as the Postmaster-General shall designate, for the use of the United States, for each such box not exceeding $3 annually, two-thirds of which shall be paid to the person having the contract for carrying the mail over such route as full compensation for the extra duty required of mail-carriers on routes where such boxes are established. And all sums received under this provision in excess of the amounts allowed the contractors for extra services imposed by this act shall be applied in payment of transportation of inland mail, and the appropriations therefor shall be reduced to the extent of such receipts."

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, we had the other day a discussion with reference to the free delivery of mails throughout the country. It seemed that that proposition was not acceptable at this time, beyond the extent of making an appropriation for the purpose of experimenting with reference to free delivery in rural districts. My proposition, contained in the amendment which I have sent to the desk, is that the inland mail may be delivered along the routes between post-offices and that, on application to the Postmaster-General, authority may be given to individuals along the line to erect boxes such as the Postmaster-General shall prescribe for the purpose of receiving mail matter from the carriers as they go along their routes.

Mail is delivered now through many of the rural districts in that way, but there is no law authorizing it to be done, and I maintain that we ought to try this experiment, which is without any expense to the Government, and ascertain whether or not the system can be made to operate to the satisfaction and the advantage of the people. If a gentleman lives quite a distance from a post-office and the mail-carrier passes his house every day, I see no reason why there should not be erected on that mail route, near that man's house, a box where his family may deposit their mail matter, and there the mail-carrier may take it up and carry it to the nearest post-office and there mail it; and into which box the mail-carrier may deliver the mail matter addressed to such person or members of his family. My proposition is that this shall be done without any expense to the Government. Indeed, the amendment provides for some revenue to the Government, although I have introduced that feature simply for the purpose of making the amendment come within the rules of this House.

My judgment is that there ought to be no such provision in it. I believe that the man who is willing to pay for a box such as the Postmaster-General shall prescribe, and have it placed near his house along the road, or any man living off the road who desires to erect a box on the road, that his mail may be deposited therein and is willing to pay the cost of erecting the boxes authorized in this amendment, ought to be permitted to have this facility for sending and receiving his mail matter.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. What is the amount?

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. Not to exceed $3 a year. This provision would enable any person who is willing to expend $3 a year for this purpose, to have his mail delivered to him without his being compelled to go to the post-office for it. It would not cost the Government one dollar, while it would be a great convenience to people throughout the country, enabling them to send and receive their mail without being obliged in every case to go to the post-office.

It seems to me that one of the greatest necessities of the present time is that the people who live in places remote from post-offices should have greater mail facilities. It is important they should receive promptly the newspapers, which add so much to general intelligence and promote so highly the comfort and happiness of the rural homes.

If it is impracticable at this time to have free delivery throughout the country (as I believe it is, on account of the expensiveness of such an arrangement where the population is sparse), it is not impracticable to have on these inland mail routes collection and delivery of the mail in the manner proposed in this amendment. I think there would be scarcely any addition to the present expense. I believe that the prices charged by contractors for carrying the mails would not be appreciably increased; but whether such would or would not be the case, there is a provision in the amendment that two-thirds of the amount paid for these boxes shall go to the contractor in order to compensate him for the extra duties devolving upon him by reason of this arrangement.

Mr. LOUD. I ask that the gentleman from Ohio be allowed ten minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. In the carrying out of this amendment the details would depend upon regulations to be established by the Postmaster-General. He would prescribe a regulation mail box, the cost of which to the Government would be perhaps very small. Whoever desired a mail box at his residence or at any point along the route would make application to the Postmaster-General, who would adopt such regulations as would protect the Government, protect the contractor, and protect the people in the execution of this system, so that nobody would suffer from it.

Locks would doubtless be provided for these boxes; and the mail carriers would carry the keys to each of these locks, so that they might open the boxes to take out mail matter which they would carry with them for deposit in the nearest post-office and to deposit mail intended for the owner of the boxes. Perhaps a box might have two compartments; and it might be used for the mail of a single family or for that of a neighborhood, that matter depending upon the wishes of those making application to the Department. This would be a great convenience to people along these mail routes.

There was much interest expressed during the discussion on a former day in devising some means for enlarged mail facilities. In many parts of the country the post-offices are 5 or 10 miles apart. I can at this moment think of a mail route where it would be a great convenience if the people living along that route could have these boxes provided. The expense ought not to be great, and if the experiment proves a success the probabilities are that the expense will eventually be not to exceed the cost of the private box.

I can not conceive of any objection whatever to the amendment. There can be none on the ground of expense to the Government. There is no objection of insecurity to those who are to have the mail boxes. There is no objection in the world except that it would be an experiment, and we can not tell how many people will want to use the boxes or whether many would desire to have them.

Mr. MOSES. My interest is the same as the gentleman's in that regard but in my section of the country the people who live along the routes get the mail service now for less than $3 a year. Now, I wish to ask the gentleman whether this amendment would add anything to what the people can already get under the decision of the Postmaster-General? He allows these contractors to take the mail out and deliver it to the people along the line. As I understand this amendment, it would make the expense greater than it is now.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. This provides that the cost shall not exceed $3 a year. If the Postmaster-General could make it less of course he would do so. But the trouble now is, I think, that the delivery of the mail under the present system is contrary to or rather is unauthorized by law. I think the sureties on the bond of the mail carriers, or any person handling the mail, would not be responsible for loss of mail or the misuse of any power now exercised in that regard. The arrangement whereby mail is delivered, as the gentleman says is practiced, is a private matter, and there is no security in such a practice. It is not authorized by law, and, as I understand, it is a violation of the law.

Mr. MOSES. But it is done at all events.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio continuing). If such permission is given it is without authority of law. There is no safety in that way of doing it. This amendment, if adopted, will legalize the transaction and afford a system which would be perfectly safe and convenient to the people, and legalize the acts of the mail carriers. The extra labor imposed upon mail carriers would not be great, and the delay caused by stopping to receive or deposit mail in the boxes would not be more than the horses ought to have for rest and a breathing spell.

The project is entirely feasible, and would benefit large numbers of persons. One of the chief objections to country life is the lack of proper mail facilities. If letters and newspapers could be brought to the country homes daily I believe the pleasures of home would be largely increased. This is an age of progress and enlightenment, and I would afford all people the very best facilities for growth and advancement which are attainable considering their circumstances and surroundings.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I must insist upon the point of order. This amendment changes existing law and does not reduce expenditures. It is obnoxious to the provisions of Rule XXI, clause 2, page 263, of the Digest.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read that portion of the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

Nor shall any provision in any such bill or amendment thereto changing existing law be in order, except such as being germane to the subject-matter of the bill, shall retrench expenditures by the reduction of the number and salary of officers of the United States, by the reduction of the compensation of any person paid out of the Treasury of the United States, or by the reduction of the amount of money covered by the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Under this rule the Chair thinks the amendment not in order. It certainly changes existing law. The Chair can see no provision in the amendment, after a careful rereading of it, that would justify the Chair in holding that it would in any sense reduce expenditures.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WILSON of Ohio. May I be permitted to call the attention of the Chair to the last provision of the amendment? This amendment provides that there shall be not to exceed $3 collected annually for each box, and that two-thirds of that sum shall be paid to the contractor as compensation for the extra duty of depositing and receiving the mail, and that the other fraction shall go to the Government and shall reduce the appropriation for this inland mail service to the extent of the receipts from these boxes. I think that it does reduce the appropriation. It was put in for that purpose. I did not think it ought to be there, but it does reduce it. If there should be a thousand boxes there is a thousand dollars, and the probability is that there will be ten thousand or a hundred thousand; and this provides that the boxes shall be erected without expense to the Government. It does not add a dollar to the expense, while it gives one-third for every box that is erected, and of course if there were a hundred thousand boxes there would be a hundred thousand dollars to be applied to the reduction of the appropriation for the inland mail service.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. There is nothing in this bill about the revenue to be derived from boxes, or the reduction of expenditures on account of revenues from boxes. It is the reduction of the amount of money covered by the bill that the rule applies to.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment requires extra work to be done on the part of the Postmaster-General and other officers, and it changes existing law in many respects, so that the Chair is compelled to adhere to his former ruling. It does not reduce expenditures, so far as the Chair can determine.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 20, page 3, add the words, "of which sum, $30,000 shall be used under the direction of the Postmaster-General in supplying temporary service to newly established offices, in cases where the establishment of star routes is contemplated."

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Chairman, it is well known that when new post-offices are established, the Postmaster-General has no authority to use a single dollar of this appropriation to aid the people who are to be benefited by the new offices in establishing route service; and this amendment seeks to divert $30,000 of the $6,000,000 appropriated for the star route service, for this purpose, and gives the Postmaster-General the discretion and authority to use it as he may see fit and deem necessary for the benefit of those people who have no service, by making such allowance as will enable him to supply service until the permanent service is established.

It is well known that that is one of the chief grievances of the people who live in remote sections of the country, in new settlements, where they have pushed out beyond the established lines of postal communications, and have no means whatever of securing this service except they hire a carrier at their own expense, and this is a hardship no Government should impose upon its citizens. As I understand it, it is not the purpose of the Government to make money out of the mail system, for we know that large sums are appropriated for general objects that do not pay anything back to the Government, not even expenses. We know that quite a sum was diverted the other day—$20,000, I believe—for the purpose of making an experiment in the free-delivery system. Every gentleman upon this floor knows that the free-delivery system does not pay any profit, that is to say, a large per cent of the offices pay absolutely nothing. Taking it as a whole it does pay expenses, some of the offices, like New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago, pay large profits, but quite a number do not pay any profit to the Government, but on the contrary are an actual burden upon the Treasury of the United States.

Now, if that be true, why should not a small sum be appropriated to help these people who live out in the remote sections of the country to get service upon contemplated routes? They must make an experiment first, to show to the Government that there is a possibility of its paying in the future. Now, that is not a fair test, because business men who live in out of the way places can not afford to wait from one to three years and risk the contingency of picking a fellow up once or twice a week to go after the mail to see whether or not an office will pay, and the consequence is that many of these offices are abolished and the people have to go from 3 to 5 miles to get their mail as before, if they get it at all, for they can not pay a carrier to carry the mail daily or tri-weekly, as you very well know. And the consequence is when a carrier is regularly employed they have to wait from one to three years to get the Government to establish service upon these routes, and frequently it is not done at all.

Now, there is no gentleman upon this floor who believes that these people ought to be subjected to this inconvenience and to this long delay. If there is any such gentleman, I should like to hear the reason which he has to offer. If justice were done a daily route with full service would be established to every post-office in the land.

As it is now, the Postmaster-General can not use this money for this purpose, because section 3971 of the Revised Statutes provides that the Postmaster-General shall not use any more than two-thirds of the cancellation of the new offices established to aid the special service for carrying the mail. Therefore he has no power to use any of this fund. Now, I ask simply that this $30,000 be diverted for this purpose.

This bill carries $155,000 more for star-route service than the corresponding bill in the Fifty-second Congress. Now, if all you gentlemen who live in cities, or who live in country places where there are daily routes, which are ready to receive the benefits of free-delivery experiments in the rural districts, will contrast your advantages with ours, I do not believe there is a single one who will object to a provision of this kind for our districts which are in less favored sections of the country and which have not been provided with the mail facilities they are entitled to. I ask for no special privileges. They want none. I ask for justice and fair play—and I am sure you will grant it. That is my opinion about it.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly. I invite it.

Mr. LOUD. Do you hold that the Postmaster-General has not now the power to establish new routes or temporary routes, and to establish new star service and new post-offices?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I have not been contending that he has not. If I have, I have made myself badly understood.

Mr. LOUD. That seems to be about all your amendment covers.

Mr. CRAWFORD. This is the difficulty I desire to obviate. Whenever there are new post-offices established the Postmaster-General has no power to establish routes or to supply service until an experiment is made, except two-thirds of the cancellation of the stamps in these new offices.

Mr. LOUD. I think the gentleman must be mistaken about that.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am not mistaken. I have examined the subject thoroughly. I know how much my people are interested in it. I know how much they have suffered on account of this law. There is no mistake about it. It is two-thirds of the salaries of the new post-offices, and that is two-thirds of the cancellation, because they can not get any more.

Mr. LOUD. I can show the gentleman where there are star routes now in existence, where the contract service calls for $2,500, and the receipts of the whole route are not over $8.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I can show the gentleman where offices return from $20 to $30 per annum, and have been in existence for three years, and no service has been supplied. Your people are more fortunate than mine, or stood in better with the Postmaster-General.

Mr. LOUD. That is the fault of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Well, I want to make the Department do its duty, or enable it to see its duty more clearly.

Mr. LOUD. This will not accomplish that purpose.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes it will. The Postmaster-General declares that he can not divert any of the sum appropriated for this purpose. This will set it apart and provide that he shall use it, in his discretion, for this purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I should like five minutes more.

Mr. BROOKSHIRE. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. MOSES. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, if he will yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly.

Mr. MOSES. You refer to those offices denominated "special"?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes; "special service."

Mr. MOSES. Is there any law requiring that all offices established in the country shall be "special" until it is shown that the receipts pay for the service of those offices?

Mr. CRAWFORD. They are to be established as an experiment. It is held by the Post-Office Department that the experiment must be made before the establishment of permanent service upon those routes, in order to determine whether or not there is sufficient demand for establishing routes with permanent service.

Mr. MOSES. Is there a general law to that effect?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Section 3971 of the Revised Statutes provides that in establishing offices the Postmaster-General shall not use more than two-thirds of the cancellation for each established office for this purpose, as I have already explained. It does not say for any specified time. It is entirely indefinite, and runs all along from one to three years. I have examined into the matter and know that to be the fact. I investigated the whole matter at the Department.

Mr. LOUD. Do you mean to say that that applies to the transportation in the country on the star routes?

Mr. CRAWFORD. I do not. Where no routes have been established, but new post-offices. It is not the routes with permanent service we are now speaking of.

Mr. LOUD. Get the statutes and see.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Where new offices are established the Postmaster-General can not establish the service without first making an experiment, and it is to be a special service for a time. That time is indefinite: it is in his discretion. He may not do it at all. Frequently he does not do it and the consequence is that those people who have petitioned the Department and worked for these offices for years have to have them abolished and go back to the old point and the old way to get their mail. That is poor encouragement to the people who are going into new countries and settling wherever it is inhabitable. These are the people who are pushing our civilization into every nook and corner of the country. It seems to me perfectly fair and just that they should be supplied with the best possible mail facilities. Is it right, and is it proper, that a great Government like this should require the citizens to go from three to six miles to get their mail? I do not think it is. You provide by appropriations that free delivery shall be established under certain circumstances in certain towns, so that the mail carrier takes the letters right to the doors of the people, and they do not pay the Government a single cent, but we go into the Treasury and take money out of the general fund of the people and pay for that free delivery service.

Now, then, is it fair to require the people who live in the newly settled country of the West and South, or anywhere else in the United States, to go this long distance to get their mail when it can be supplied at so little cost? You can not expect these people to be much interested in building up any business enterprise so long as you withhold from them their just rights as citizens of a common country. But you look at it away from the great central points, and fail in a large measure to appreciate our situation. I insist that it is right and necessary for this amendment to be adopted. I have no doubt that the Postmaster-General will be very glad to use this money for this specific purpose. I think the merits of the case are so generally understood and appreciated that there will be no objection to the application of this amount for this purpose.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to detain the committee, but this proposition is so eminently fair to the sparsely settled portion of the country that I hope it will be accepted by the committee without further argument.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the amendment. It should be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment will be considered as adopted.

Mr. LOUD. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if he does not believe and know that the law at present covers this entire subject?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman object to the adoption of the amendment?

Mr. LOUD. It is putting two tails on one horse.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I will say to the gentleman from California that I was under the impression at first that the law was ample to cover this very question; but the practice of the Department is certainly against it. The Department now rules that you can not get a new mail route before you establish the post-offices along the route; so that the post-offices have to be created before the route can be established.

Mr. LOUD. You want to establish the route before you establish the offices?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I would rather do that. Of course the route is always between two points.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The Clerk read as follows:

For mail messenger service, $1,285,000.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After the words "eighty-five thousand dollars," in line 24, page 3, of the bill, insert:

"Provided, That hereafter no discrimination shall be made in the rate of postage on books transmitted through the mails by publishers and authors. But all such mail matter shall be transported at the rate now provided by law for books transmitted by publishers through the mails."

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I reserve the point of order on that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. What is the point of order?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. That it changes existing law and does not reduce expenditures, but, on the contrary, rather increases them.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] on the point of order.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have sent to the Clerk's desk proposes to equalize the rates of charge for transportation through the mails of the classes of matter referred to therein so as to make them bear equally upon publishers and authors. The gentleman in charge of the bill makes the point of order that this amendment changes existing law. It does not change existing law. It simply makes it the duty of the Postmaster General, in establishing rates of postage upon second and third class mail matter, to make no discrimination in favor of publishers or against authors

That is all. There is no law which gives publishers a preference over authors in the transmission of the matter which they desire to send through the mails. There is no statute which does that. It is done by a regulation of the Department. Now, this practice of putting rates of postage upon books transmitted by their authors through the mails as compared with the rates upon the same books when transmitted by the publishers does a very great injustice to the authors, and it rests solely upon a regulation of the Department. I raised this question in the last Congress and had occasion to call attention, as I now call attention, to the injustice of this Department regulation. Let me refer to the provision in the postal laws and regulations under which this inequitable distinction is enforced:

Third-class matter defined, and the rate.—That mail matter of the third class shall embrace books, transient newspapers, periodicals, circulars, and other matter wholly in print (not included in section 12), proof sheets, corrected proof sheets and manuscript copies accompanying the same; and postage shall be paid at the rate of 1 cent for each 2 ounces or fractional part thereof; and shall be fully prepaid by postage stamps affixed to said matter.

Now, sir, the right of authors to their productions was secured by the original provision of the Constitution of the United States. That provision, which is found in section 8, Article I, empowers Congress "to promote the progress of science and useful arts by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be obliged to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] if he will read the existing law upon this subject.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. It is quoted on page 4978 of the RECORD, under the date of June 2, 1892, and is as follows:

THIRD-CLASS MATTER DEFINED.

That mail matter of the third class shall embrace books, transient newspapers, periodicals, circulars, and other material in print not included in section 12, proof sheets, corrected proof sheets and manuscript copies accompanying the same, and postage shall be paid at the rate of 1 cent for each 2 ounces or fractional part thereof, and shall be fully prepaid by postage stamps affixed to said matter.

Now, it will be observed that while the publisher, under the regulations of the Department, can transmit these books at a cost of 1 cent, the author, if he desires, for any purpose whatever, to transmit them through the mails, is required to pay 8 cents.

This, I say, is manifest injustice to the author, to the mind which creates the book, to the thought which pervades it, and which desires to impress itself upon other minds. In this way the publishers are granted a special privilege which does not belong to the authors, the creators of the works. It seems to me that a post-office appropriation bill ought to deal primarily, not so much with the question of what amount shall be appropriated, as with the question of the rates of postage upon letters, pamphlets, and periodicals. That is a subject which a post-office committee ought specially to consider. Many petitions have come into this House and been referred to that committee in favor of reducing the rate of postage on letters from 2 cents to 1 cent. There is a very widely extended sentiment in this country in favor of that change, making our rate like that which prevails in many of the European countries.

Whether we have reached the point where we can do that I am not at present prepared to say, but certainly it is a subject-matter which the Committee on the Post-Office ought seriously to consider, and the very first object of their consideration ought to be equality in the rates of postage upon matters passing through the mail, whether it belongs to the first, the second, or the third class. In the instance to which I have called attention a manifest inequality exists which ought to be remedied, and if that can not be done here I do not know how it is to be remedied. I have offered this amendment at the end of the general appropriation, "for mail messenger service, $1,285,000." Here is an enormous amount of money to be appropriated to all these various matters to be transported through the mails, and certainly the Department ought to be required, in adopting its regulations in reference to the expenditure of so large an amount of money, to make the postal tax bear equally upon the publisher and the author. I think the point the gentleman makes that this amendment changes existing law is not well taken, and that the amendment would certainly reduce expenditures, if not to the Government, at least to the authors of the works.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The amendment is not germane. It proposes to amend the paragraph contained in lines 23 and 24, "for mail messenger service, $1,285,000." Now, there is nothing in that paragraph in regard to the rates of postage, and the amendment is not germane. Besides, it is obnoxious to Rule XXI.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. In reply to the position taken by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON], that this amendment is not germane to the subject-matter of the paragraph under consideration, I call attention to the fact that the paragraph has relation to the very messengers who on trains and steamers and mail routes carry this mail, and it makes a large appropriation for such service. It seems to me that if there is any portion of the bill to which the amendment could be appropriate, this is the one.

Besides, I do not think the gentleman from North Carolina ought to interpose this objection. He ought to be willing to have these charges equalized. How can it be to the interest of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads that there should be unequal charges to different citizens for the same class of mail service—a low rate to one class of citizens and a high rate to another—a low rate to the man who prints and publishes and distributes a book, and a high rate to the man whose brains have created the book? I submit that this objection, even if there be anything in it, ought not to be interposed. The gentleman certainly ought to be willing that this inequality should be cured. It would be an honor to his committee and to him as its chairman to be instrumental in curing this inequality which has so long existed under the regulations of the Post-Office Department.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I am perfectly willing to have equality of rates established wherever justice may demand it; but I am opposed to tacking legislation of this sort upon an appropriation bill. The gentleman can not accomplish what he desires in this way.

The CHAIRMAN. So far as concerns the second point made by the gentleman from North Carolina, the Chair overrules it, because it has been held repeatedly that an amendment offered to an appropriation bill need not necessarily be germane to the pending paragraph, but must be germane to the general provisions of the bill. The citations will be found in the Digest. The only question then for the Chair to determine is whether the amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi changes existing law without reducing expenditures. The amendment is peculiarly worded; and unless the gentleman from Mississippi and the gentleman from North Carolina can agree as to what the existing law is the Chair will have to examine the law before the point can be determined. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Mississippi to be added at the close of this paragraph provides—

That hereafter no discrimination shall be made in the rate of postage on books transmitted through the mails by publishers and authors; but all such mail matter shall be transported at the rate now provided by law for books transmitted by publishers through the mails.

Now, what the Chair desires to know is whether there is one rate of postage for books transported through the mails by publishers, and another rate for books transmitted through the mails by authors.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I presume the gentleman from North Carolina will raise no question on that matter at all. This subject was debated very largely in the last Congress when I offered a similar amendment, and no one then disputed, as I think no one will dispute now, my statement of the law. If the Chair will send to the Library for the Postal Guide for 1894 he will find the law quoted just as I have stated it to be.

Mr. LOUD. If, as I understand the gentleman to say, the present law covers the subject and allows authors to send their books through the mails at the same rates as publishers, what is the necessity for this amendment?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Because we want to inhibit the Post-Office Department from adopting any regulations which shall give, as I understand is now given, a preference to publishers, allowing them to send books through the mails at the rate of 1 cent a pound, while the author of the book is not allowed to transmit it through the mails unless he pays 8 cents a pound.

Mr. LOUD. But, as I understand, the gentleman says this question is settled by the law, not by any regulation of the Department.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. It is the regulations made by the Post-Office Department under the law and which favor the publisher while doing injustice to the author that I want to get at. I think the amendment is perfectly germane; for, as the Chair has very well remarked, if not germane to the pending paragraph it is certainly so to the subject-matter, which ought to be included in a bill coming from the Post-Office Committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chairman has no hesitation on that point. The only point on which the Chair is in doubt, and upon which he asks the gentleman in charge of the bill for information, is as to whether the existing law provides that one rate of postage shall be required upon books transmitted through the mails by the author, and another rate upon similar books transmitted by publishers?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. The gentleman from North Carolina, I think, will not question that.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The law permits publishers to send books through the mails at a certain rate, and does not permit authors to send their books through the mails at the same rate. If this amendment be adopted, authors will be permitted to send their books through the mails at a lower rate than now allowed, so that the amendment instead of reducing will increase expenditures, and at the same time change the law.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. The amendment reduces the cost to the people and brings about an equality of rate as between publishers and authors.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi accept the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina as to the provision of existing law?

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. Under the law as it now exists the great publishing corporations of the United States are permitted to send any book through the mails at 1 cent a pound, while the author of that very book under the law and regulations of the Department can not transmit it by mail unless he pays 8 cents a pound.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the amendment of the gentleman from Mississippi changes existing law and does not retrench expenditures. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HOOKER of Mississippi. I desire to give notice to the chairman of the committee, since he has objected to my amendment, on account of it being obnoxious to the rules of the House, that I am going to introduce a bill and have it referred to his committee to have the law changed, and we will see what sort of a report he makes upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation by railroad routes, of which a sum not exceeding $10,000 may be employed to pay freight on postal cards, stamped envelopes, and stamped paper, and other supplies from the manufactories to the post-offices and depots of distribution, $25,500,000.

Mr. SPRINGER. I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After line 16, page 4, insert:

"Provided, That hereafter all periodical publications issued from a known place of publication at stated intervals, and as frequently as four times a year, by or under the auspices of a benevolent or fraternal society or order, organized under the lodge system, and having a bona fide membership of not less than a thousand persons, or a regularly incorporated institution of learning, shall be admitted to the mail as second-class matter, and the postage thereon shall be the same as on other second-class matter and no more.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I wish to reserve the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, this does not change the existing law, but it changes a ruling of the Department. The Post-Office Department has ruled that publications which are embraced in the proviso are not the publications which are entitled to be admitted to the mails as second-class matter, but come under a different class, for some reason which I do not understand. These publications referred to in the amendment are newspapers issued by fraternal societies, sometimes weekly, sometimes monthly, and sometimes quarterly; but they are frequently taken by a very large number of persons. I know of one publication myself that has over a hundred thousand subscribers, which contains general literature and the news of the day, and all matters that are given in the ordinary publications, while at the same time it is devoted to the interest of a particular order, and is published for the benefit of those who are members of the society.

It seems to me that there can be no reason for compelling such publications to pay a higher rate of postage. But the Third Assistant Postmaster-General has decided that they are not admissible to the mails under the second-class rates.

We have received during this Congress petitions from all over the United States, embracing hundreds of thousands of people. I suppose there are at least a million persons everywhere throughout the Union who have been petitioning for the passage of this law.

Mr. TUCKER. Is this the same as the Hainer bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes. There is a bill pending, in substance the same, both in the Senate and the House.

Mr. Chairman, this does not change existing law, but only a ruling of the Department; and I have stated and argued the question to the Department myself. It is my opinion that the Department is wrong in its ruling, and that the law is just as is provided now in this amendment.

Mr. HAYES. Will the gentleman allow a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that this is a very important matter. The gentleman from North Carolina makes a point of order on the amendment that it changes existing law, and that it not only does not reduce expenditures, but will have a tendency to vastly increase them for mail transportation. The Chair desires the gentleman from Illinois and other gentlemen addressing the Chair to confine themselves to the point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I was doing so, Mr. Chairman, and endeavoring to show that this amendment does not change the existing law, but only a ruling of the Department about which there is a considerable difference of opinion. Having myself examined the law in regard to the subject, it is my opinion that the Department is wrong in its ruling, and that the amendment embodies the law. It therefore amounts to an instruction on the part of Congress to the Department to carry out the law as it stands, and not change it. It is not a change of the existing law, but requires the Department to correct its ruling. That is the purpose of the amendment, to enforce the law against the improper ruling which has been given to it.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. To more particularly call the attention of the Department to the fact that it is the law.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir. And to declare that it is the law as construed by Congress.

Mr. COOMBS. Interpreted by Congress.

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes.

Mr. HAYES. The gentleman from Illinois has practically answered the question I desired to ask him a few moments ago, that the amendment does not change existing law, but is a notice to the Department that it has misconstrued existing law.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is my understanding of the case: that the law has been misconstrued, and a vast number of people are of the same opinion. The object of the amendment, as I have said, is to enforce the law as it exists.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I have listened, Mr. Chairman—I just came in and have been informed what the point of order is, and what the amendment is—I have listened with some interest to my colleague and wish to say to him by way of reinforcement, if the Chair will indulge me, that I agree with him that under this law this class of publications is entitled to go at the pound rates in the mails. It seems to me that it is perfectly competent, notwithstanding the rule that prohibits legislation on general appropriation bills, for us to place a limitation on the expenditure of this money, namely, that an official who misconstrues the law and refuses to comply with the law shall in the future expenditure of the money be made to comply with it as a condition of the appropriation. Therefore I am in harmony with my colleague and his remarks on this amendment, and if it would be in order I should like to say that the gentleman is reinforced almost universally throughout the length and breadth of the country, by thousands upon thousands of people who are interested in these publications, and who understand the law to be this way, and who have been surprised at the misconstruction of it given by the head of the Department.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to gentlemen who desire to discuss this point that the Chair would be very glad to hear any gentleman who will address the Chair on the point of order.

Mr. HAYES. It is certainly a very interesting question as to whether or not this does change existing law. It seems to me that the position is well taken that where there is a doubt about the law, and where a Department has construed the law differently from the general acceptation of it, and differently than the public generally construe it, it can not be said that it is a violation of this rule to say that Congress may declare what the law is. That is all this amendment is. It declares what the law is, rather than seeking to change existing law. If we could not do that by reason of this rule, it would certainly be a very strange proceeding, and would be entirely out of keeping with what we ought to do. Certainly in the case of a dispute as between the text of the law and the application of it in the Department, we ought to have the right to here declare what the existing law is.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is as I understand it.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is an act of legislation.

Mr. TERRY. Will the gentleman's amendment cover the case of journals issued by medical associations?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. No.

Mr. TERRY. I should like to offer such an amendment.

Mr. SPRINGER. If I could submit to the committee copies of publications which have been submitted to me, and I have no doubt to many gentlemen here, they could not tell those publications by the reading and all the contents of those papers from any other newspapers that pass through the mails every week as second-class matter, and why they are excluded from the mails is a mystery to me and to everybody outside of the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. EVERETT. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. EVERETT. When was the ruling made that these publications do not come within the law?

Mr. SPRINGER. There have been a number of rulings as to particular publications, and as I understand it, it is not the effect of a general ruling upon all, but upon each publication when it is submitted, and that has been going on for several years.

Mr. EVERETT. Arbitrarily, without any general rule?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. There is a rule of the last Administration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair again requests the committee to maintain order. This argument is addressed to the Chair, upon the point of order, and the Chair desires to hear it.

Mr. SPRINGER. To show that this is simply declaratory of the law, and to show that we who appropriate the money have a right to declare what the law is, and the purposes for which we make the appropriation, without violating this rule, I will say that the practice of the Department is to take two publications and rule one out and the other in, and no man can tell why one was ruled out and the other ruled in.

Mr. EVERETT. What officer of the Department makes the ruling?

Mr. SPRINGER. The Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is not this the law, that every paper which has a bona fide subscription list comes in at the cheap rate, but where it is simply a mode of advertising, then it comes in at the higher rate? Is not that the law?

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. That ought to be the law.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Is not that the law, and is not that the difficulty which the gentleman's objection meets now?

Mr. SPRINGER. There should be a distinction, and the Department makes no distinction.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does not the rule of the Department rest upon that law that I have quoted, and can the rule of the Department be changed without the law being changed?

Mr. SPRINGER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I do not agree with him as to his construction.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I am making no construction. I am asking for information.

Mr. HAYES. As I understand it, there is this distinction: where there is a specific subscription list of subscribers, and where the publication is sent out to the members of a society, although it may have all the elements, by way of advertisements and otherwise, of a newspaper, there is that distinction.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is the pretext for this ruling, which has no foundation, it seems to me, in fact.

Mr. LYNCH. I desire to ask the gentleman this question, Was this law ever construed by the Department different to what it is now?

Mr. HAYES. Practically yes, and specifically no. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman may answer both ways.

Mr. HAYES. They let them go through the mails. The first ruling was in the case of the publication called Printer's Ink, and that was the other way.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman has answered it.

Mr. HAYES. It is practically one way and specifically another.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is all I desire to say upon the point of order.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address myself briefly to the point of order. With respect to the justice of this amendment there can be no question. The only question arising here is technical; and it is urged that this amendment violates a rule of the House which provides that no amendment shall be allowed or shall be in order which changes existing law. Will this amendment change existing law? We have a right, as the gentleman from Iowa has suggested, to correct an erroneous ruling of the Department.

The inhibition of the rule is not against making this correction, but is against making a new law or changing the law. In construing this rule we should bear in mind the familiar canon of construction that any rule in derogation of the right of the committee to transact its proper business in its own way should be itself strictly construed, while we should incline to that construction which without doing violence allows the committee to perfect legislation. Technicality in method of procedure should not be allowed to defeat a meritorious amendment. It should be employed only to defeat vicious legislation. But the inhibition of the rule is not against a change in construction of existing law. This amendment in fact simply declares what the law is and always has been. It simply overrules a line of bad departmental precedents and does not seek to change any law. The construction of a Department does not rise to the dignity of law. The whole trouble in the case arises from an unfortunate bias in the early decisions made in the Post-Office Department, and these have been accentuated and increased from time to time down to the present Administration. The reasons upon which these publications have been excluded are these: First, it is alleged by the Department that the subject-matter contained is not of a "public character." If the same rule should be applied, or if the same reasoning be applied, to every publication all would be ruled out on the same ground. For instance, one man may take the American Economist, which is a paper published in New York to disseminate the principles of protection. That may be held of interest simply to a certain class of people who believe in that theory. Then the same thing is true in respect to the American Industries, which is a publication issued by the so-called Tariff Reform Club, which also may be said to interest simply a certain class of readers.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. It is interesting to everybody.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Take again, a party political paper, or a county paper, which contains simply the local news. Each is of interest to a number, and not all people; but there is no newspaper which goes into every family and that interests the entire public. Would you say the Staats Zeitung, of Illinois, published in German; the Pokrok Zapadu, of Omaha, published in Bohemian, which only a small fraction of our people can read, contain matter of public character, and these fraternal papers, reaching many more, do not contain such matter? The Criminal Law Magazine reaches but a few lawyers, yet it is allowed pound rates. I make no objection to this. The papers I mention are properly admitted under the law. I cite them simply to show that the trouble is not with the law, but with the absurd construction which has been placed upon it. Then the next objection is that they have not a legitimate list of subscribers. That, also, is not true. With all of these publications, I think nearly every one of them, the cost of publication is paid by someone, either by an association in its corporate capacity, by societies, or aggregations of individuals. So their subscription price or cost price is in reality paid. How can it affect the Government or its revenues who pays it? I may subscribe for my neighbor, and the paper passes without question. Every other man may do the same, but if they do it as a society it is all wrong. Is there not a strange lack of reason in this distinction? A "legitimate list of subscribers" should be held to mean an honest list—one free from fraud.

These publications are issued and disseminated not for the purpose of making a pecuniary profit, but for the dissemination of information; and here we have the Government and a great Department, presumably founded on intelligence, which seems to me ought to foster and encourage the distribution of information, expressly inhibiting the dissemination of useful knowledge, tabooing the publications of schools, colleges, learned societies, and fraternal and benevolent institutions, but allowing publications issued for pecuniary profit, including the Police Gazette, special privileges!

Mr. HAYES. Why should there be any distinction as to a paper for which subscription is taken. Is not the subscription incorporated in the dues to the society.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. There is absolutely no reason for making the distinction, but that was the point I was undertaking to illustrate.

Mr. HAYES. In the dues are included the subscription to the paper.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Certainly. In the majority of cases that is the precise method. So it seems to me that there is no basis for the objection made by the Department. I say that the present rulings of the Department are due to an unfortunate bias in the first decision upon this subject. It did not receive the consideration which it should have received and which it would receive if it were a new question.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Does the Post-Office Department discriminate only against that class of papers not regularly subscribed for by their readers?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. It does not even do that. There are a great number of books which are put in pamphlet form, and which circulate throughout the country, which are not similarly discriminated against. The attention of the Department has recently been called to the fraternal and educational publications, and they have been excluded.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Are not these paid for or subscribed for?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Not simply as readers and individuals, but the subscription is paid in the shape of dues to the society, and it amounts to the same thing.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I think the discrimination is absolutely wrong.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. And by the individuals belonging to that society.

Mr BRYAN. Instead of collecting the subscription from each individual the society pays it all and then collects from each person.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. In some instances they do.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I will say to my colleague and the committee that the usual way is where a society publishes a paper, for the society to pay for the paper and collect it along with other dues.

They pay for these papers, either in their organized or corporate capacity, and each individual pays his proportion just the same as gentlemen may subscribe for a paper in a club, and each individual pays his proportionate price, but it is paid by the individuals in the end. The club or society acts simply as an intermediary.

Mr. BRYAN. Are not Sunday school papers subscribed for in much the same way?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. They are sent to the superintendent and he distributes them.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Yes, sir.

Mr. SWANSON. There are two conditions, as I understand the rule, under which a paper can be admitted at the pound rate. One is that the matter must be for the public good, and the second is that the publication must have a bona fide list of subscribers who are voluntary.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Yes, sir.

Mr. SWANSON. Now, these papers that are excluded are admitted to be for the public good, for the general interest, and not for a special interest; but the ground on which they are excluded is that their subscribers are not voluntary. The men who appeared before the committee testified that their subscriptions were collected by the society instead of by the individual members, so that it is simply a technical distinction which excludes these publications from the mails, while a paper like the New York Herald or the New York World is admitted, although the subject-matter may not be so much for the public interest as what is contained in these other publications.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. That is true; and, as a matter of fact, there are petitions here showing that many a million of people are interested in this question.

Mr. GEAR. Five millions.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to hear the gentleman from North Carolina in support of his point of order, but will ask the gentleman to first read the existing statute on the subject.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. It is the act of March 3, 1879:

That the conditions upon which a publication shall be admitted to the second class are as follows:

First. It must regularly be issued, at stated intervals, as frequently as four times a year, and bear a date of issue and be numbered consecutively.

Second. It must be issued from a known office of publication.

Third. It must be formed of printed paper sheets, without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial binding, such as distinguishes printed books for preservation from periodical publications.

Fourth. It must be originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character, or devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry, and having a legitimate list of subscribers: provided, however, that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit to the second-class rate regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes, or for free circulation, or for circulation at nominal rates.

Now, of course, I contend that this amendment is obnoxious to the point of order, for the reason that it is intended to change existing law. It is not intended to change any ruling of the Department. It is not framed in such a way as to construe the meaning of this particular statute. Publications that are entitled to go through the mails at the pound rate all go through if they comply with the terms of the law. As to the fraternal journals, there are 125 of them in the United States, and at least 115 go through the mails at the pound rate, and of the other 10 the probabilities are that there are only 4 or 5 that have been rejected by the Department. Now, I am not going to argue whether it is desirable to change the law or not—that is another question—but I say the effect of this amendment is to change existing law and make it obnoxious to the rule; and, while upon that subject, I will have read a letter of the Postmaster-General, which I send to the desk. The letter was read, as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., October 31, 1893.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your communication of the 16th instant, transmitting copy of bill H. R. 4003, "to admit to the mails, as second-class matter, periodical publications issued by or under the auspices of regularly incorporated benevolent societies and orders and institutions of learning," and asking me for "such information and suggestions" as the subject may warrant.

In reply, I regret to say that this measure is one that does not commend itself to my favor. The reasons upon which my objection is founded are these:

First. Just at this time I believe it to be unwise to make any reduction of postage rates or any change in the classification of mail matter that would bring about either a loss of revenue or an increase of postal expenditure. The fact that the Department's annual income is $7,000,000 short of its expenditure affords sufficient warrant for this belief.

Second. The law and the regulations of the Department regarding second-class matter are now too liberal. Many publications that ought to be paying third-class postage, go through the mails at a cent a pound; and the list of these, owing to the precedents that have been made and the practice growing out of them that seems too deep-rooted to get rid of, is annually getting larger. I am very strongly inclined to think that the whole subject of second-class matter ought to be carefully examined, with a view not to enlarge the scope of the law, but to curtail it. This would be in the direction of real reform; it would enlarge the postal revenue, and it would be only fair to the publishers of legitimate second-class matter, who are the proper beneficiaries of the liberal provisions of the law governing this kind of matter, and whose rights are too often invaded by what are really bogus publications.

Third. If this bill should pass, the amount of matter that would be let into the second class by it would, either immediately or eventually, be enormous. Let us see, generally, about what its terms would induce:

First. The benevolent or fraternal societies or orders in this country amount to many thousands. Masons, Odd Fellows, Knights of Pythias, and other secret orders; the extensive class of insurance organizations, with a fraternal or benevolent feature; probably all mutual insurance companies or societies; the many charitable societies in the great cities; the innumerable societies connected with the churches, and, indeed, all the religious organizations of the country could, if they chose, avail themselves of the benefaction conferred by the bill; and that they would, whenever it suited their purpose to do so, is certain. Many of these bodies, I know, do not now issue periodicals, but under the stimulus of the privilege given by the bill many of them would do so, and all that would be needed would be a charter of incorporation, which in most of the States can be had for a trifling fee.

Second. The institutions of learning in this country amount to thousands. Looking casually over the last report of the United States Bureau of Education, I find that the colleges and universities, the schools of theology, medicine, law, and science; the technological, normal, commercial, and business colleges, and other classes of schools—not, of course, including the public schools—aggregate over 3,000. To these should be added scientific and historical societies; medical and law societies; agricultural, art, and scientific societies; and other societies the object of which is to advance learning in all its great departments. When it is considered that any publication issued four times a year by these institutions and societies may, under the terms of the bill, go through the mails at the rate of a cent a pound, the burden that would be imposed eventually upon the postal service would be enormous.

Third. Among the present safeguards provided by law against an inundation of the mails by publications claiming second-class privileges, are that they shall not be issued to advance the other interests of the publishers; that they shall have a list of subscribers; that they shall not be intended primarily for advertising purposes, or for gratuitous distribution; and these conditions have been found by experience to be in the interest of the Government as well as of legitimate publications. In the case of the publications covered by the terms of the bill under consideration, all these barriers are removed, and the strange provision is substituted that the periodicals shall be "originated and published to further the objects and purposes" of the publishers.

Thus catalogues, prospectuses, reports, calls of meetings—everything, in a word, that is of an advertising character or calculated to help the society, or order, or institution—could come in. It needs but a moment's reflection to see that, under such a provision as this, the amount of mere advertising matter—such as now pays when sent by mail 8 cents a pound—that would be mailed at a cent a pound, would be almost incalculable. In the great cities this mass of matter would in many cases be so great that the letter-carriers could not handle it without a great increase of force.

Altogether the bill is so objectionable that I trust your committee will not hesitate to report it adversely.

Yours, very respectfully,

W. S. BISSELL, Postmaster-General.

Hon. JOHN S. HENDERSON,
Chairman Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, can we have the amendment read in connection with that letter of the Postmaster-General?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have the amendment read later. This letter of the Postmaster-General is largely an argument as to the merits of the bill to which it relates, and the Chair desires to examine the existing law as presented by the gentleman from North Carolina with the amendment submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], which the Chair is unable to read in the gentleman's handwriting? [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I desire to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether this question was considered by the committee?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. It is being considered now.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. We have sent you more petitions on that subject than have ever been sent in on any other subject except, perhaps, the antioption bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. There are a great many.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. And were they not in the hands of your committee before you made up your bill?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. A good many. Most of them, however, have come in since the bill was made up.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Does the letter of the Postmaster-General, which you have just had read, refer to this bill or to another one which is not either before the House by way of an amendment or before your committee?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I can not remember at this moment which bill it refers to. But that is not material.

The Postmaster-General's letter applies to one bill as well as the other.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Well, I state as a matter of fact that this letter of the Postmaster-General refers to a bill which was introduced in October, and since that time I have introduced another bill, obviating the objections which the Postmaster-General makes there, so that the letter does not relate to this at all.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I move that the committee rise.

The resolution was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6016) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. KRIBBS, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. BRICKNER, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

And then, on motion of Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina (at 5 o'clock and 2 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

The Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Journal stands approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 6556) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the concurrent resolution of the Senate to print and bind 10,000 copies of the proceedings of the Pan-American Medical Congress held in Washington City in September, 1893.

LIQUOR LICENSES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the excise board for the District of Columbia, transmitting, in compliance with section 2 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1893, entitled, "An act regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia," the report of the operations of the board from the date of the passage of that act; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE. I present the memorial of Otis E. Weld & Co. and 31 other wholesale liquor merchants and importers of Boston, Mass., in which the memorialists state that the ultimate result of the provisions of the internal-revenue tax on distilled spirits as now arranged in the Wilson tariff bill will be, in their opinion, a reduction of revenue to the Government and a gradual absorbing of their business by distillers, and, in fact, virtually the creation of another trust. They therefore remonstrate against the bill and against those clauses in the bill which relate to the direct tax on liquors. I move that the memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE presented the petition of Hiram J. Townsend and 24 other citizens of Massachusetts, praying that fraternal society and college journals be admitted to the mails as second-class matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of sundry citizens of Manito, Ill., praying that fraternal society and college journals be admitted to the mails as second-class matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. VOORHEES. I present a large number of petitions from the Saving and Loan Association League of Indiana, praying that such associations be exempt from the operation of the income-tax provision of the tariff bill. I wish to state that the prayer of the petition has been complied with by the Committee on Finance in making their report to this body. I ask that the petitions may lie on the table.

Mr. HOAR. Do I understand that such exemption is contained in the bill as it now stands reported?

Mr. VOORHEES. It is in the bill as reported, and the bill was made so largely by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] sitting on the right hand of the Senator from Massachusetts, and myself. The Senator from Ohio can bear witness about the exemption of loan and building associations. I wish all such petitioners to understand that their prayer for the exemption of loan and building associations from the income tax has been granted by the Committee on Finance.

Mr. HOAR. There are a good many of such institutions in my neighborhood which are not included in the phraseology of the bill.

Mr. VOORHEES. If a copy of the bill is handed me, I think I can point out to the Senator from Massachusetts the provision exempting such associations.

Mr. ALDRICH. I was not listening to the Senator from Indiana. I desire to know what the paper purports to be.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wish to present some petitions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The petitions presented by the Senator from Indiana will lie on the table.

Mr. VOORHEES. I do not want to take up the time now.

Mr. COCKRELL presented petitions of sundry millers, merchants, and manufacturers of St. Louis, Mo., and a petition of the board of directors of the Merchants' Exchange of St. Louis, Mo., praying that section 104, which proposes to abrogate certain reciprocity treaties with the Latin-American States, be stricken from the pending tariff bill; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER presented the memorial of D. M. Hildreth and 9 other citizens of the District of Columbia, remonstrating against granting to the Metropolitan Railroad Company the right to extend its tracks around Lincoln Square, in the city of Washington, D. C.; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. VEST presented a petition of sundry millers and merchants of St. Louis, Mo., praying for the retention of what are known as the reciprocity provisions of the McKinley law; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOAR presented a memorial of the Worcester Typothetæ, of Worcester, Mass., remonstrating against a renewal of the contract of the Post-Office Department whereby stamped envelopes are furnished to consumers without extra charge for printed addresses thereon; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of Red Rock Council, No. 229, of Lynn, Mass., praying that fraternal society and college journals be admitted to the mails as second-class matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a petition of the American Forestry Association, praying for the passage of House bill No. 119, to protect public forest reservations; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for the passage of the Torrey bankruptcy bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of Lodge No. 105, International Association of Machinists, of Toledo, Ohio, remonstrating against a reduction of the internal-revenue tax on cigars; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Mount Nebo Grange, No. 664, of Columbiana County, Ohio, praying for the retention of the duty on wool; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HARRIS presented the petition of J. J. R. Walker, jr., and sundry other citizens of Wartrace, Tenn., and the petition of T. J. Moore and sundry other citizens of Sharon, Tenn., praying that national and local building and loan associations be exempted from the income-tax provision of the Wilson tariff bill; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the faculty of Cumberland University, Lebanon, Tenn., remonstrating against the passage of the bill to abolish the Coast and Geodetic Survey and to transfer its work to the Navy and Geological Survey; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. VEST, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 5) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to transfer a certain piece of land in the State of Michigan to the city of Saginaw, reported it without amendment.

Mr. BATE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1233) for the relief of Henry Lane, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 925) granting an honorable discharge to John Russell, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1513) for the relief of Maj. Gen. George S. Greene, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

CUSTOM-HOUSE BUILDING AT ERIE, PA.

Mr. QUAY. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1757) to provide for the sale of the old custom-house building in the city of Erie, Pa., to report it without amendment. It is a bill but ten lines in length, is recommended by the Treasury Department, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill, and the Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to its consideration as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to sell on the most advantageous terms, either at private or public sale, with or without public advertisements in the local newspapers for proposals, the old United States custom-house building and property of the United States connected therewith and appertaining thereto, in the city of Erie and the State of Pennsylvania, and to give a quitclaim deed to the purchaser thereof, and to deposit the proceeds of the sale to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States as "miscellaneous receipts derived from the sale of Government property."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments on a question of personal privilege.

Upon reading the RECORD this morning I find some errors in the remarks I submitted yesterday which are of a very material character in my opinion. I do not often care to make corrections of mistakes which I find in my remarks, but in this instance I am made in at least a dozen instances or more to use contrary to my universal practice the words "United States" in the singular number. I understand from the Reporter that the cause of these violations of what I regard as the proper nomenclature of the Constitution to have occurred in this way: That inadvertently when I first used the words "United States" I used them in the singular number, and he afterwards made all that I said upon that subject conform to that expression.

To show that the error is material, and very material, I desire to read to the Senate from the opinion of one of the eminent justices of the United States Supreme Court. He took occasion in a very recent case to animadvert upon the improper and unconstitutional practice of using the phrase or the words "United States" in the singular number. In the case of Stanley and others vs. Schwalby and others, decided at the October term, 1892, Mr. Justice Field used this language:

> The defendant, Davis S. Stanley, and his codefendants were officers of the Army of the United States, and as such were in possession of and held the land, and, answering for himself and them, he says that as individuals they do not claim, and have no title to, the land in controversy, but claim that they are lawfully in possession thereof as officers and agents of the United States, and that the United States "holds in herself" complete title to the property in controversy.

The learned justice proceeds:

> The designation thus given to the United States as "herself" in a pleading drawn by one of their attorneys is open to criticism, as, in the Constitution, both before and since the civil war, the United States have always been designated in the plural—

In the Constitution—

> thus, Article III, section 3, declares that "treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort—

The learned justice proceeds to show, as I will read in a moment, that this nomenclature of the Constitution has been continued in the amendments adopted since the war. He says:

> And Article XIII, adopted since the civil war, declares that "neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime, whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist in the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction.

I desire to say in reference to these quotations that in every single instance in which the United States are referred to in the Constitution, where it became necessary to designate the number as singular or plural, the plural number is always used. In addition to what Mr. Justice Field says, in Article II of the Constitution it is said:

> The President shall, at stated times, receive for his services, a compensation, which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected, and he shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the United States, or any of them.

Not any of it. Then, in the article on the judiciary, Article III, we have this language:

> The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority.

So that for myself I desire to disclaim any intention or any power even to use the words "United States" in a sense different from that in which they are used in the Constitution. In every instance, as I have before remarked, in which the United States are used in the Constitution they are used in the plural and never in the singular.

Up to within a very recent period the nomenclature of the Constitution has been universally followed by our public men. I know of no state paper, though there may have been, prior to the message of President Cleveland upon the subject of Hawaii, which departs from the language of the Constitution on that subject. Mr. Calhoun universally used United States in the plural and so did his great antagonist Mr. Webster. In the Hawaiian message (if I am right in supposing that to be the first one) I find for the first time a departure in a grave state paper from the language of the Constitution, and I regret to say that in a paper so able and so clear, both in the statement of facts and law, there exists the blemish of using the words "United States" in the singular number.

I now ask to have the correction made in the RECORD.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I do not know how much significance may attach to the grammatical question as to how the United States of America should be spoken of, whether in the plural or singular in addressing the Senate; but I do not wish to let this occasion pass without saying for myself that I consider this country to be one Government, one nation, one people.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the correction will be made in accordance with the request of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRIS. Is the introduction of bills in order?

Mr. HOAR. Let the request be stated from the Chair, so that the Senate may understand it.

Mr. GEORGE. The request is to correct the RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi rose to a personal explanation, and requests that certain corrections in his remarks be made in the manner he has indicated.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi one question before that is granted, if there be no objection. I ask him whether in his judgment in E pluribus unum, "unum" is in the singular or plural number?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. DOLPH. What is the request?

Mr. GEORGE. I want to answer the question of the Senator from Massachusetts. "Unum" is singular and "pluribus" is plural.

Mr. DOLPH. The request is to correct the RECORD, is it not?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request is to correct the remarks of the Senator from Mississippi in the RECORD.

Mr. DOLPH. No one objects, I think, to the correction of the grammar of the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair has submitted the request to the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that the remarks as corrected may be read to the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will not insist upon that, for it would involve the reading of the Senator's whole speech.

Mr. CHANDLER. In deference to my friend from Tennessee I withdraw the request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the corrections will be made.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HARRIS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1866) for the relief of Isaac L. Musselman, of Tennessee; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GRAY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if not incompatible with the public interests, to inform the Senate as to the present condition of affairs in the Samoan Islands, and to communicate to the Senate copies of any correspondence with the Governments of Great Britain and Germany throwing light upon the same.

REPORT ON TEXTILE MANUFACTURES.

Mr. HAWLEY submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed of the special report of the Eleventh Census on the textile manufactures of the United States, 10,000 copies, of which 3,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 7,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE COMMITTEE HEARING.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 6556) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

J. FLOYD JOHNSTON.

Mr. PLATT. I move that the bill (S. 1420) for the relief of J. Floyd Johnston, administrator, which has been reported and is now upon the Calendar, be recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HILL. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn until Monday next.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New York.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH and Mr. HOAR. No debate.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator withdraw the motion long enough for me to make a statement a minute and a quarter long?

Mr. ALDRICH. I have made no motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion was made by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL].

Mr. HILL. What is the request?

Mr. HARRIS. It is that the motion be withdrawn until I can make a very brief statement.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that probably his brief statement would lead to other brief statements upon the other side of the question.

Mr. HARRIS. Possibly it might; I can not tell.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think we had better have the vote.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope, in view of the present condition of the country and the pending measures here, the vote will be in the negative.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope it will be in the affirmative.

Mr. CHANDLER. I rise to a question of order, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Debate is not in order. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New York.

Mr. VEST and Mr. HARRIS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DUBOIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. GIBSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MCLAURIN (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON]. I should vote "nay" if he were present.

Mr. PALMER (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BRICE]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. SHOUP (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from California [Mr. WHITE]. If he were present, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS (after having voting in the negative). Has the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted, the Chair is advised.

Mr. HARRIS. Being paired with that Senator, and not knowing how he would vote on this question, I must withdraw my vote.

Mr. COCKRELL (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], who is necessarily detained from the Senate. I have no doubt he would vote "yea." I have already voted "nay;" and I will pair the Senator from Iowa with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. DUBOIS. I will transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HIGGINS], and vote "yea."

CAPT. SCRIVEN'S REPORT ON THE NICARAGUAN CANAL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the Senate of March 29, 1894, a report on the Nicaragua Canal in its military aspects, made by Capt. George P. Scriven, Signal Corps, to the Chief Signal Officer; which, with the accompanying papers was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. T. O. TOWLES, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 4765) to authorize the St. Louis River Bridge Company and the Duluth Transfer Railway Company to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge over the St. Louis River from a point at or near Grassy Point, in the village of West Duluth, Minn., to the most accessible point opposite, in the State of Wisconsin; and

A bill (H. R. 5978) to authorize the construction of a steel bridge over the St. Louis River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 1836) to give effect to the award rendered by the Tribunal of Arbitration at Paris, under the treaty between the United States and Great Britain concluded at Washington, February 29, 1892, for the purpose of submitting to arbitration certain questions concerning the preservation of the fur seals; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

COINAGE OF STANDARD MEXICAN DOLLARS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], coming over from a previous day; which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. WOLCOTT on the 2d instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States with a view to encourage and extend our commercial relations with China and other Asiatic countries, be requested to enter into negotiations with the Republic of Mexico, looking to the coinage by the United States, at its mints, of standard Mexican dollars, under some proper agreement with the said Republic of Mexico as to seigniorage, method and amount of said coinage; and that he be further requested to report the result of his negotiations to the Senate.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, my colleague [Mr. WOLCOTT] asked that the resolution which has just been read lie over until to-day with a view of submitting some remarks on it; but he has been unavoidably detained from the Senate, and I desire to speak very briefly upon it. After that, if no other Senator desires to speak upon the resolution, I ask that it may go over until Monday in order that my colleague may have an opportunity of submitting his remarks at that time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Colorado to speak at this time upon the resolution.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, since the passage of the act known as the silver-purchase repealing act of last October, silver in this country has disappeared as a money metal. It is a commodity, in the proper sense of that term, and the pending resolution recognizes it, so far as the United States is concerned as a commodity. The purpose of the resolution is to advance its price as a commodity, and not as a money metal.

I need not state that in this country very large interests have grown up in the production of silver, and that those interests have been very seriously injured by the recent legislation to which I have referred. The Government of the United States was a purchaser of 54,000,000 ounces of silver per annum. That was practically the product of this country. The market for that silver was destroyed by the act passed in October last. Since that time the producers of silver have been compelled to seek a market in other sections of the world. The Government by that repealing act declared that it would no longer attempt to maintain the price of silver.

Just before the passage of the repealing act India, the great consumer of American and other silver, closed its mints to that metal, and thus another great market for silver was destroyed. The nations of Europe have closed their mints to silver, and the only mints which are open to it to day are the mints of Mexico, China, and Japan. In every other part of the world silver is a commodity, and not a money metal. The demand, as we all know, for its consumption as a commodity is inconsequential. We are all aware that the great demand for silver in all time has been for money, and that the demand for its use in the arts and sciences is so inconsiderable that one of two things must happen either the silver-miner must cease to produce silver or he must sell it at a price so exceedingly low that he will be unable for any considerable length of time to produce it.

Mr. President, the product of silver in this country has been one of the great products which have enabled us for several years to maintain apparently a balance of trade in our favor. Every dollar of this despised white metal which has been produced at the market value has been as good as gold in export and has, in my judgment, very largely taken the place of gold. It can not therefore be denied by even those who are opposed to the use of silver as money that the people of the United States are as largely interested in the production of silver as they are in every other product which may swell our exports and enable us to properly settle our balances with foreign countries.

As I said, the demand for the use of silver in the arts is so small that it may be set aside and not considered. The demand in India has been shut off, first, by closing her mints, and secondly, as I understand, by an import duty upon silver which may be sent to that country. So we are left very largely to China and Japan and that section of Asia not included in India for our market for silver.

The proposition of my colleague in this resolution is that the Government of the United States shall do with the Mexican dollar what it attempted to do with the trade dollar, that it shall be coined for the purpose of commerce and not for the purpose of domestic circulation.

I suppose I need not say there could be no possible danger if our mints were opened to the coinage of the Mexican silver dollars, that they would enter into circulation in this country. Not being a legal tender they would have, of course, only the value of the bullion in the dollar. The only question is whether we can by this method make a market for our silver. If we can, nobody ought to object. It seems to me that the effort is worth making.

While I do not desire to detain the Senate more than a few moments on this subject, I wish to state why I believe we can make a market for our silver. Of course the Mexican mints are open to the coinage of our silver, but the delay and expense of sending silver to Mexico and returning it, and the delay that would be occasioned by its manufacture into dollars, are so great that I think it may be safely said that no portion of the American product—I mean the United States product when I say "the American product"—has gone to Mexico for coinage. So our silver has gone mainly to Europe. We have sent very little silver in bars to Asia.

It is almost impossible to find a market for bar silver in China. I shall not say the same of Japan, because there can be some market found for it in Japan, but only to a small amount probably. But in China bar silver is not favored. The Mexican silver dollar, with the cactus, eagle, and snake stamped upon it, is thoroughly understood all over that great kingdom, and it has been demonstrated that those people are conversant with its value—I am speaking now of its purity as silver—and they are ready to take the Mexican dollar when they decline to take silver in any other form because of their fear that it is not sufficiently fine.

We attempted, as is known, to make a dollar heavier even than the Mexican dollar, because we believed by making it a trifle heavier we could secure the Asiatic trade—that is, the trade of China and of the English Straits Settlements, Ceylon, and that section. We utterely failed. Those people would not take it. The French made a dollar which they undertook to circulate in Asia, and they failed.

Mr. MANDERSON. Will the Senator, if he has the figures at command, give us, not precisely but in general terms, the number of trade dollars issued and the number which were kept in Asia?

Mr. TELLER. I can not now give the figures.

Mr. SHERMAN. I can state approximately that the total coinage of trade dollars was about $35,000,000, of which $7,000,000 was subsequently redeemed by the United States; so that about $28,000,000 was absorbed in the China or foreign trade.

Mr. TELLER. I think that statement is substantially correct. We were several years in disposing of that amount of silver, and that amount of silver was undoubtedly taken in China and melted up, because it did not enter into circulation. I will say that the Japanese also had a trade dollar of the exact weight of the Mexican dollar, and the Chinese declined to take that dollar.

Thus the Government of the United States, the French Government, and the Japanese Government all tried to force their dollars on the Chinese without success. A few years since the Government of Mexico changed the device upon its dollar and sent this dollar, which was of exactly the same purity and fineness as the old Mexican dollar, to China, but they found that the Chinese declined to take that dollar. Consequently they returned to the old-fashioned Mexican dollar, with the cactus, eagle, and snake.

So I think it may be assumed, without any further discussion or argument, that the Chinese will not take any other coin or any silver in any other form so readily as they will take the Mexican dollar. Then, it becomes a question whether, having put our silver in that form, we can not obtain a new market for it. Of course we can only do that by the consent of Mexico, and, I think, by practically allowing Mexico something for the privilege of so doing, and I shall state the reason for that presently.

It is suggested that while we sent 28,000,000 silver dollars to China, those silver dollars never entered into Chinese circulation, but were simply treated as so much bullion. They were a little heavier than the Mexican dollars, and quite as fine.

Mr. SHERMAN. They were stamped by the Chinese with a "yen," and then I think they became Chinese coins and circulated as such.

Mr. TELLER. It is certain that such efforts were never successful. A number of years elapsed before we repealed the act for the coinage of the trade dollar, and yet we only succeeded in getting into China the small amount I have mentioned, while undoubtedly China takes in some years from Mexico from eighteen or twenty to twenty-five million silver dollars. I can not say exactly how much China takes of the whole issue, of which I shall speak in a moment, but China takes a large proportion of it, and the balance is taken in that immediate section of the world.

When the Mexican dollar went to China some years since it was stamped by the merchant who first took it and then passed on to another merchant who stamped it, and so on, till it became so marked that it was almost impossible to tell what it was; but I am informed by those who are familiar with that country that that system has largely ceased, and that the Mexican silver dollar now circulates there as money the same as it does in Mexico and other sections of the world, and as silver dollars do here.

The question is whether China will take the silver if we put it into Mexican dollars. Last year the Mexican Government coined 26,000,000 of these dollars. Of that sum it is estimated that $25,000,000 were exported. Between six and seven millions of that amount of money went by the way of the Suez Canal to China and the Strait Settlements, and about eight and a half millions went by the way of San Francisco, making a little over $15,000,000 which we can trace directly into China. The balance went perhaps largely into the hands of returning Chinamen and was used in various ways which are not so easily accounted for. It is, however, pretty certain that of the $26,000,000 coined in Mexico, $25,000,000 found their way into Asia.

Is that the full demand of China and of that section of the world for silver? If so, it would seem that it would not be worth while to coin these dollars. That, however, is not the fact, and that is not the demand. For a number of years China took at about the rate of $15,000,000 worth of silver a year, largely in bullion. Then the import of bullion into China fell off very largely, and for a number of years there has been very little silver imported into China, except in the shape of the silver dollar.

It is claimed by those who are familiar with this subject that China has exported to other portions of Asia within the last ten years more silver than she has taken; in other words, that China has been losing silver for a number of years, and that there is no considerable amount of silver now in circulation in China, but that that dearth or lack of silver can now be made up if it is put in the form the Chinese prefer to have it.

Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate for a few moments to the fact that China is still on a silver basis; that is to say, neither gold nor silver in China is legal-tender money; that it is a mere matter of choice which may be offered and taken. A man may take gold or he may take silver, but silver is the circulating medium and the transactions of China are almost exclusively in silver. Gold, of course, is treated as a commodity. Silver has lost none of its purchasing power in that country.

At the last session of Congress I took pains to have inserted in the RECORD—and I shall not detain the Senate by repeating them now—some tables carefully prepared in China, showing a large number of articles, the prices of which had somewhat fallen and not risen, that is, that the purchasing power of silver in China was in 1893 more than it was in 1873, and the same is the case to-day.

I have before me a copy of a report to the English foreign office, made by Acting Consul-General Jamieson to the Earl of Rosebery, dated August 5, 1893, from which I shall take occasion to read a few brief extracts to show that the statement I have made is correct—that the purchasing power of silver has not fallen in China. That being so, the price of silver remaining stationary and the prices of Chinese goods being what they were twenty years ago, while prices in other portions of the world have fallen, everyone may see at once that is a great stimulus to export, because while in England the prices of China teas have fallen materially, the prices, measured by silver, have not fallen at all in China on account of the depreciation of silver.

There has been a fall in Chinese teas because of the great popularity of and the increased demand for Indian teas and the decreased demand for Chinese teas, but no fall whatever to be attributed to the depreciation of silver. That may be said of all other products. Consequently they are sent abroad and sold at the gold price, and silver is returned at the Eastern or gold price and used in China at the old original price, thus acting as a bounty upon exports. That was also true of India up to the time that the English gave fictitious value to the rupee.

The foreign trade of China for a people so numerous is rather small, it being only £52,000,000 for the last year; but it is very much more than it was thirty years ago; it is much more than it was ten years ago; it is continually growing, and is bound to grow and increase; and, in my judgment, the more silver that can be sent there in a form that will be acceptable to those people, the greater will be the increase of their foreign trade.

There are in the report which I hold in my hand, and from which I propose to read some extracts, a number of tables, which I do not care to insert in the RECORD, because they support the view I advanced on a former occasion, and the tables I had then inserted are very much more complete than those I have here.

I desire to read a few extracts from the report of Acting Consul General Jamieson:

An examination of those tables will, I think, establish the following conclusions:

I ask the Senate to follow me while I read these extracts, because they refer to a matter of great interest touching the monetary situation not only of China, but of our own country:

1. As regards articles which are both produced and consumed in China, silver prices have on the whole tended to decline. There is a moderate rise in a few articles, principally food stuffs, but all over there is a decline of about 9 per cent.

In other words, the purchasing power of silver is 9 per cent more in China now than it was 20 years ago.

2. As regards articles of native origin exported to foreign countries the silver price has not advanced with the fall in exchange. Prices, on the whole, are almost exactly on the level of the years 1870 to 1874.

3. As regards articles of foreign manufacture or production imported for sale in China the average price in silver has declined very considerably.

That statement is so different from what is the understanding of the average man who discusses this question that I shall venture to read it again:

3. As regards articles of foreign manufacture or production imported for sale in China the average price in silver has declined very considerably.

Although they must pay in gold, prices have not advanced in China.

Chinese can now obtain their supplies at a less cost even in silver than they could twenty years ago by some 25 per cent.

Mr. GRAY. That refers to foreign supplies?

Mr. TELLER. Foreign supplies.

In other words, the purchasing power of silver has not declined in respect to any of the classes of commodities, and has even considerably increased in respect of the first and last classes.

The first class are commodities which are made and consumed in China, and the last class those brought from foreign countries.

The purchasing power of gold, on the other hand—that is, its local market value—has steadily advanced with every successive fall in the rates of exchange on London, till now 4s. will purchase what formerly required 6s. 6d., or £60 will now do what used to require £100. This is best illustrated by putting the gold and silver prices side by side as follows:

The several quantities of commodities enumerated in the tables could have been bought as below.

Then follow some tables. After giving the tables, Acting Consul-General Jamieson says—and here is a proposition which I think will not be denied:

The only way, it would seem, in which foreign trade or the fluctuations of foreign exchanges can affect internal prices, i. e., prices of articles which are not in demand for foreign trade, is by drawing away or bringing in one or other of the precious metals. If the result of foreign trade is to cause a flow of silver into or out of the country the value or the purchasing power of silver will tend to fall or rise as the case may be, and so with gold; but, as we have seen, there has been no great addition to the stock of silver in China during the period under review—and consequently we ought not to expect a general rise in prices. The fluctuations which we find in the prices of commodities in Table A can, indeed, be shown to coincide closely with the greater or less supply of silver. From 1870 to 1880 there was a continuous favorable balance of trade, indicating a flow of silver into China.

Accordingly we find there is during this period a tendency of prices to advance. From 1880 onwards there has been no silver coming to China, and as without this extraneous supply the stock in the country is insufficient to meet the growing wants of commerce, the price of commodities tends to fall.

Skipping some portions of the report which are interesting, but which I shall not detain the Senate by reading, it continues:

The experience of the last twenty years shows that with every fall in the gold price of silver there has invariably been a simultaneous lowering in the gold price of commodities in Europe. This has variously been ascribed to the scarcity of gold or to the greater strain thrown upon existing stocks by its extended use, or to a reduction in the cost of production, but may it not be ascribed principally or entirely to the competition of the produce of silver-using countries? If it is a fact that there has been no general rise in the silver price of produce in India or China and other silver-using countries, or a less rise than the fall in silver should produce, then the gold price of such produce when imported into Europe must necessarily have fallen with the fall in exchange.

From this point of view it is really silver that rules the world; it is the purchasing power of the cheaper metal that determines the price all over. Just as in a bimetallic country the cheaper metal will drive out the dearer towards her monometallic neighbors, so, as between countries of different standards, will the prices prevailing in the country of the cheaper metal drag down prices all over to their own level. And reasoning forward from the experience of the past it would not, perhaps, be too rash to conclude that prices of commodities in Europe, so far as these can be drawn in any fair quantity from silver-using countries, must continue to decline with every further fall in silver.

In regard to the third matter of inquiry which I propose to discuss, viz, how far the fall in silver has stimulated exports from China, an answer has in effect been supplied by the foregoing remarks. There has been a stimulus, but not such a stimulus as might have been expected. The stimulus has been a readiness on the part of foreign merchants to buy native produce of all sorts at current quotations, but not the stimulus which comes from offering higher prices.

Mr. Jamieson then goes on to argue the question whether there will be an increase of Indian exports, and how much the country will take of silver, etc. Of course, if the export is increased it will make a market for silver. Summing up, he says:

Viewing the situation from the Chinaman's point of view, he finds that his tael or ounce of silver is just as valuable to him as it ever was. He can buy the same amount of all the ordinary necessaries of life for the same money as formerly, and of foreign articles he can buy a great deal more. If he has things to sell to the foreigner, he can usually get rather a better price than he used to get, and he finds the foreigner mostly ready to buy, always excepting tea.

He has spoken in another place of the fall in the price of tea.

His wages, rent, and taxes have remained unaltered, as has also the price of land. He can get the same interest on his spare capital if he has any.

The only thing greatly changed is the price which foreigners are willing to pay for gold, and their strong desire to get it. Formerly the price of gold was 15 ounces to 16 ounces weight of silver for 1 of gold, and there was not much demand for it. Now there is a universal desire to get it and send it out of the country at prices which have gradually risen from 16 taels to 18 taels, 20 taels, 24 taels, and even 30 taels for 1 tael's weight of gold.

Reverting to the questions which I proposed to myself at the outset of this paper, the conclusions may be thus summarized:

1. China has not been within the memory of the present generation a great absorber of silver. From 1870 to 1880 she did take off about £3,000,000 per annum, but since 1880 this process has ceased, and there has even been of late years a slight export.

2. (a) The fall in the gold price of silver appears to have produced no effect on the general level of prices of articles produced and consumed in China.

(b) As regards articles produced in China and commonly exported to gold-using countries, there is a slight tendency to a general rise. This will probably be enhanced in the near future.

3. The fall in the price of silver has stimulated exports by making it possible for foreign merchants to purchase and export at a profit a large variety of miscellaneous articles which formerly would have yielded no return at all. The value of such miscellaneous articles has quadrupled within the last ten years. Tea has declined very largely both in volume and price, but for this there are no special reasons.

That is all I care to read on that subject. If I felt disposed, and had the time, I think it would be a very interesting question to look a little further into the reason why silver-using countries have maintained a stability of value of their products, while in gold-using countries the value of products has fluctuated immeasurably.

Mr. GRAY. Before the Senator from Colorado closes, I should like to have him explain why it is that if the purchasing power of silver in China has not fallen, as it is generally supposed that it had fallen—I understand from the statement just read in regard to articles of merely domestic consumption the purchasing power of silver had remained nearly the same——

Mr. TELLER. Practically the same.

Mr. GRAY. There being a difference of about 9 per cent, and in regard to even foreign articles of consumption it is only about 26 per cent below the purchasing power in 1870. That the consul attributes in some degree to the fact (as I understood the Senator to read) that silver had not been imported into China in any very large quantities during a recent period; that China had not been the great absorber of silver that it had been in her past. How does the Senator explain the fact that that state of things has not attracted silver into that Empire, and that it has not been profitable and gainful for the traders of the world to take the silver there and buy cheaply in places where commodities can be bought cheaply and turn it into commodities which they may use for international trade? I ask for information. That point rather puzzles me in the exceedingly interesting statement of the consul.

Mr. TELLER. That point would require considerable attention and some discussion. I will tell the Senator briefly why I think that is the case. In the first place, China has been practically for many years, until very recently, an exporter and importer in about equal quantities. We were formerly purchasers of tea from China to a great extent, and had not Ceylon and that section of the world in India gone to raising a valuable and rather a superior tea, I suppose China would have been filled up with silver to a much larger extent than has been the case. But the taste in tea, or the fashion in tea, if I may use the term, has been the other way. So, one of the great exports of China, which would have been stimulated by this condition, fell off for lack of demand, because the goods were not as acceptable to the world as the goods of another section of country. That is one thing that has probably caused it.

Another, I suppose, has been because whatever the merchant bought in China he had to sell in a foreign country on a gold basis. While he might dispose of his silver in China at a profitable venture, and while the price of commodities in China remained as they did for twenty years, stationary, when he reached Europe with his goods he found that he had to sell them on a gold basis, and that sale had no reference whatever to what he had paid for them in China. So the difficulty has been that the profit was not as great to him as it would be to a Chinese merchant who sent the goods out, because the latter must receive his profits at home. The Chinese merchant who sent out his goods would realize a profit that the European merchant would not. The Senator can readily see that that would be the case, because the Chinaman took his silver and converted it into money or into bars and treated it as money at the old price, while if the other man got silver he had to convert it into gold.

Mr. GRAY. Then, if the Senator will pardon me for a moment, the obvious situation would still remain with the condition described in the exceedingly interesting statement of the consul, that a person who wishes to buy silver in London for gold can take the silver to China and purchase with it a quantity of goods that are valuable commodities——

Mr. TELLER. Tea and silk.

Mr. GRAY. Articles that are valuable, and he would get nearly as many as he could purchase with gold. Then he can take the goods into the countries wanting those articles and get a gold price nearly equal to the silver price. Is not that the situation?

Mr. TELLER. No; that is where the Senator from Delaware is in error. The English merchant, we will say, goes to China with a quantity of silver. It may be Mexican dollars for which he has paid 48 cents. He buys silk. His dollar is a dollar when he gets there. He has 52 cents on every dollar in advance. But he finds that he can realize no more on what he has purchased with his dollar in China than he could with his 48 cents in gold in Europe. There is the trouble.

Mr. GRAY. That is not the statement in the consul's report.

Mr. TELLER. Oh, yes; it is. That is the result. When the merchant buys his goods in China and pays for them in dollars he takes them into Europe and turns them in, not at the price he bought them, but whatever the price may be measured in gold. Instead of getting what he paid for them, he sells them very much below, because he sells them upon the gold price. Let me illustrate that by supposing he took a bushel of wheat.

Mr. GRAY. If the Senator will allow me one moment, I shall not interrupt him further. I understand the statement to be that the purchasing power of silver in China is much greater than it is generally supposed to be; that in twenty or twenty-five years it was only 9 per cent less than it had been. So the purchasing power being greater than it is here or in England, why would it not always be a profitable transaction to buy the silver and go to China and buy the commodities with it?

Mr. TELLER. That would be the case if you could sell the commodities in silver, but you have to sell them at gold prices, because silver has ceased to be a money, although you can take silver and treat it as gold.

Mr. GRAY. What is the name of the consul who made the report the Senator has referred to? I have forgotten it.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. Jamieson. He says here:

As regards articles which are both produced and consumed in China, silver prices have on the whole tended to decline. There is a moderate rise in a few articles, principally food stuffs, but all over there is a decline of about 9 per cent.

That is, the purchasing power of silver is 9 per cent higher on those articles than it was twenty years ago, and on foreign articles it is 26 per cent higher—not lower, as the Senator from Delaware says.

I dislike to start in upon a proposition that involves so much, and that is not a part of what I intended to say; but in discussing this question a great many people say to me, "How can it be possible that silver purchases just as much in Mexico as it ever did," as is the case; "that silver purchases just as much in China as it ever did," as is the case, as the Senator will see, and it purchases a little more. It arises probably from the fact that China has had a dearth of silver, and a scarcity of money of course always means a decreased price of commodities and an increased purchasing power of silver, the same as gold would have an increased purchasing power. Now, we will take, for instance, the trade of the world, which after all is barter. I go to China and buy a shipload of goods and take them to England and sell them. Then I take on board another cargo of goods and take them back to China and sell them. There is an exchange of the commodities of one country for the commodities of another. That is done almost invariably. The balances, as we all know, are very rarely settled in gold or in money. It is only where there is a great balance of trade, where one country has something that some other country must have that it pays in money, like England takes our wheat and our cotton, because she can not get them anywhere else, and so settles the balance practically in money. But that is not the general business of the world. It is an exchange of commodities. The commodities in China sell for just what they have been selling for. The ship is loaded at the old silver prices. The owner of the cargo goes to Europe and sells the merchandise at the gold price, and apparently he has made a great loss.

I will illustrate it by supposing he goes to India and buys a shipload of wheat. He buys wheat there at $1.10, say, no matter what the price is. He gets to England and it is worth 60 cents. But he has paid for it in silver. He sells it for 60 cents, and if he buys silver and carries it back and coins it there it is apparently a profitable transaction. But if, on the contrary, he buys goods that are demanded in India, he buys them at the gold price and consequently while he has paid for his goods in India or China at the old price, yet he gets as many goods in exchange when he gets to Europe as he did twenty years ago. Consequently when the goods are transported to India and China the merchant can sell them for the same he could when he made the exchange twenty years ago.

That is rather foreign to what I intended to say this morning. As I am going to leave the city to-day I did not intend to open up the question. At some other time I shall be very glad to deal with the question, because it seems to me that it is pretty important. The only thing I wanted to say this morning (and I did not mean to be diverted into saying half I have said) is that there is a probability that we may not have a currency transaction with China, but a commercial transaction by means of these dollars. If so, and if we can get the permission of the Mexican Government to coin them, I should think it would be profitable for us to encourage trade in that way. We paid last year to China seventeen or eighteen million dollars more than she bought from us. We paid it in gold by the way of Great Britain. Now, if we can pay that indebtedness hereafter in silver we shall be so much the better off.

If there is not a balance of trade in our favor we can send as many more silver dollars as will offset the indebtedness we have incurred by purchasing from them. We can purchase gold bills from London, and we can turn our silver into account in that way. It seems to me the question is large enough to attract the attention of the Senate, and I believe on a proper showing to the Mexican Government they will allow us, upon proper terms and proper restrictions (and, of course, we would not think of doing it in any other way), to coin American silver into Mexican dollars and send them to China or wherever we can find a market.

I will state also that it is very possible that we may find a market for these Mexican silver dollars in India. The Indian government has put an import duty on silver. These dollars will not go to India as bullion, but as money, and they can take them in that way, and I think they will be more popular in India than silver would be in the form of bullion, because they can use them in trade with China, and the silversmith of that country, who is generally a comparatively poor man, and can not buy a large amount of silver, and who does not want to buy big bars, can buy a few of these dollars to make spangles and bangles and ornaments of silver. He would not have to purchase a large amount of money. He could get what he wanted, and it would be in a convenient form. It is barely possible that a good market might be found for our silver in that way also.

Mr. GRAY. How does this proposition differ from the old trade dollar?

Mr. TELLER. It differs in this respect: The old trade dollar was a 420 grain dollar, and this dollar will contain 416 grains.

Mr. GRAY. But the object is the same?

Mr. TELLER. The object is the same. The only difference is that this is the popularized dollar of China, the Strait Settlements and all that part of Asia, up and down, and no other dollar has ever been popular; and, in my judgment, it would take a generation or two to make a dollar that would be popular. The question is whether we shall avail ourselves of the prejudice in favor of this dollar to secure the opportunity to coin our silver into such dollars and send them to that country.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I understand this resolution to be a proposition to put our silver in the most available form for export to China. I do not understand it has any bearing on the currency question at all. In fact, it can not have any bearing on that question, for the Mexican dollar will of course pass here simply at its bullion weight. But the Mexican dollar, as the Senator from Colorado [Mr TELLER] has pointed out, is the recognized dollar of China. The Chinese are a conservative people. Dollars in other forms have not been acceptable there, and the Mexican dollar is.

The Mexican dollar at this moment, I understand, sells for a small premium in London for the purposes of the China trade. The demand is greater than the supply. Now, if we can make an arrangement by which we can put our silver into the form acceptable in China, we facilitate its export. We also enable ourselves, it seems to me, to make our payments directly through San Francisco in our own commodity, put into this most desirable form, for the teas or the silks or whatever else it may be that we import from China.

As it now is, we pay for our China teas very largely by way of London; that is, by the purchase of bills upon London. If we can put our silver into these dollars in this convenient form, dollars on which there is to-day a premium, it seems to me on the chances, indeed on all reasonable expectation, we shall open a method by which we can send our silver directly from San Francisco into China to pay for our imports from that country. At all events the experiment is well worth trying. It can do no possible harm, and it may add largely to the market for our silver product.

But it seems to me there is another side to this matter which also makes this experiment worth a trial. If we can pay China direct from San Francisco it will throw into our hands a certain amount of trade that now passes by way of London, leaving there a profit. This seems to me an important consideration.

However we may differ as to what is our best domestic policy in regard to silver, there is one thing I think all are agreed on, whether they favor immediate free coinage or the effort to restore silver by means of an international agreement, and that is that it is England which is to-day the great enemy of any effort for the restoration of silver to the world's currency. I do not mean the whole of England, but the bankers and the mighty moneyed interests of London. They are the people who to-day stand across the path of any intelligent movement for the restoration of silver. The people of England are divided among themselves. There is a great cry to-day from all engaged in the Eastern trade, from all the manufacturers of Lancashire, that something should be done for silver.

England is held in her present position by the banking and moneyed interests of London, speaking in a broad and general way. She is in great difficulty with her Indian exchanges; she is in great difficulty with her manufactures. She needs relief. No one who has followed the English newspapers or the discussion of the Indian currency question can fail to see that the movement in favor of silver is growing in England all the time. But England is governed in her attitude towards silver solely by her own interests. She is not engaged in maintaining the gold monometallic standard because she is in love with what some persons declare to be an economic truth. She is engaged in maintaining it because her bankers and her capitalists believe it pays. The rest of the world stands either ready or anxious to do something for silver, and the gold monometallic policy of Great Britain now in force among all great civilived nations is, I believe, the great enemy of good business throughout the world at this moment.

Therefore it seems to me if there is any way in which we can strike England's trade or strike her moneyed interest it is our clear policy to do it in the interest of silver. Nothing, in my judgment, as the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] pointed out the other day, can help England so much in her present difficulties as to open the markets of this country to her under the proposed tariff bill. But, I suppose the evidences of popular delight with that bill are so great that we can not hope for any relaxation in the effort of the Democratic party to press it to a conclusion. Nevertheless, wholly apart from the question of free trade or protection involved in the Wilson bill, or from the merits of the bill, it seems to me it is to the American interest, if we can reach English business or English interests in any point, to strike at that point.

I think the experiment contemplated in this resolution is worth trying. I think we may injure her in that way. But I would go very much further than that. I would strike her on those points where she would feel it most, on her colonial trade. In the interest of silver (I am not speaking now with the slightest reference to protection or free trade) I would strike her with prohibitive duties, if necessary, on her Cape diamonds. I would strike her in the same way on her Assam and Ceylon teas. I would put discriminating duties on her Australian wool. We want, if we can, to force England to take the view of the silver question which we believe is not only for our interest, but for the interest of trade, of good prices, of better wages all over the world.

There is only one way to deal with England on this question, and that is to make her feel it in her pocket. If, on the other hand, we help her by opening to her wider markets, we shall simply confirm her in her present attitude in favor of gold monometalism and against all efforts to widen the use of silver among the nations of the world. She has closed the mints of India. I do not know whether it is by her influence that the mints of Persia have been closed, but as it is we can see in her own Indian exchanges, in her failure to sell the council bills, the effect of her policy. We can see in the failure of Guatemala to pay her bonds, in the threatened failure of Mexico to meet her interest, what is coming from gold monometallism carried to the extreme to which it is now being carried. It seems to me that if any opportunity offers for us in any direction to attack England, which is the only way we have ever found it possible in the past to come to any agreement with her, either by discriminating duties or by an effort like this to open a wider market to silver, it is clearly in the best interests of the United States to do it.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I shall not pretend to make any extended remarks. As I am going away from the city and will probably not be here on Monday, I desire simply to record my wish that the resolution may pass. I think it is of much more advantage in every direction than the seigniorage bill or any legislation of that kind.

So far as I am concerned, I hope that no legislation like the seigniorage bill will be brought before the Senate or the House again. I think the silver advocates should stand squarely for free coinage and accept no intermediate legislation.

I have not much faith in England agreeing to an international arrangement. We are, I think, unfortunately placed in this country. Almost all of the Republican party, at least the leaders of that party, and a great many Democrats of standing and influence, agree with England in her financial policy, while the whole Democratic party agrees with her in regard to her trade propositions. On the one hand, England benefits by our gold standard; on the other hand, she is benefited by the free-trade proclivities of our Democratic friends. She is gaining the advantage, no matter which party is in power in this country. She has been struggling ever since 1816 to put the world on a gold basis. Now that she has succeeded and is reaping the benefits of it, it does not seem to me probable that she will give up this advantage and agree with us as to bimetallism. Therefore, I think we must fight this battle out alone. We must either make an arrangement with the silver-using countries or take a firm stand ourselves in favor of bimetallism.

This proposition does not at all interfere with our financial laws. It has no effect whatever on our financial system. The Mexican Government of course will be responsible for these Mexican dollars. Almost all of our silver mines are closed. I do not see any prospect of their being opened soon, unless through some such arrangement as the one now proposed.

It does not occur to me that any possible harm can come. I do not believe any one financial interest will suffer at all by passing such a measure; and I am rather inclined to think that it would make a market for all of the silver which is produced in the West and restore prosperity in a measure to that part of the country.

I am inclined to believe that the Mexican Government would agree to this proposition. They would collect their seigniorage of 4½ cents on the 100 cents, and as we could take our silver now to their mints and have it coined, I do not believe they would object to opening our mints to the coinage of their dollars.

Last year, as the Senator from Colorado has said, some 25,000,000 Mexican dollars were used chiefly in the Chinese trade. Some seven or eight million dollars were so used in Singapore and the Strait Settlements. He has no doubt correctly stated that there is not a great deal of silver in China; and with the great mass of people there it is altogether probable, it seems to me, that they could use 50,000,000 or 60,000,000 of these Mexican dollars.

The Chinese do not care for bars of silver bullion. They do not like to use it in that form, but they will accept and use the Mexican dollars. Perhaps the reason why they will use the Mexican dollars and will not use our trade dollars is that the Mexican mints are opened to the unlimited coinage of silver. I am rather inclined to think that is the reason why those countries prefer those dollars to our trade dollars or to the French trade dollars.

Mr. President, this is all I desire to say, as I see the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

A bill (H. R. 4765) to authorize the St. Louis River Bridge Company and the Duluth Transfer Railway Company to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge over the St. Louis River, from a point at or near Grassy Point in the village of West Duluth, Minn., to the most accessible point opposite, in the State of Wisconsin; and

THE REVENUE BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

Mr. PEFFER addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. QUAY said: Mr. President, I rise to suggest——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. PEFFER. I will yield for a suggestion, Mr. President.

Mr. QUAY. I rose to suggest that there is not a quorum of the Senate present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Daniel,	Jones, Ark.	Platt,
Allen,	Gallinger,	Kyle,	Proctor,
Bate,	George,	McPherson,	Quay,
Berry,	Gibson,	Martin,	Ransom,
Caffery,	Gorman,	Morrill,	Shoup,
Call,	Gray,	Murphy,	Teller,
Camden,	Hale,	Palmer,	Vest,
Carey,	Harris,	Pasco,	Vilas,
Chandler,	Hoar,	Peffer,	Voorhees,
Cockrell,	Hunton,	Perkins,	Wilson.
Cullom,	Irby,	Pettigrew,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-three Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. PEFFER resumed his speech, and having spoken altogether for over two hours—

Mr. GALLINGER said: If the Senator from Kansas will yield to me for a moment, I desire to suggest that he has now in a very earnest and interesting way discussed this question for two hours and ten minutes; and while we all know him to be a man of great endurance, I feel sure he must be very much fatigued. If agreeable to him, I will ask that he be permitted to discontinue his remarks this evening and continue them at the next meeting of the Senate, or at such other time as may suit his convenience.

Mr. PEFFER. To that I have no objection, Mr. President.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator from Kansas desire to suspend his remarks at this time and continue them to-morrow?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Kansas has suggested that such a course would be agreeable to him.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Kansas desires it, of course I shall be glad to accommodate his wishes.

Mr. PEFFER. Let me state my own view of the matter. Now that I have begun, I should like to conclude in a reasonable time. I have spent a great deal of time and thought upon this subject, and my object is to continue the discussion somewhat upon a new line. I should like to be permitted to conclude my remarks regularly; not to-day, but at the first meeting of the Senate after to-day, if I can conclude them, and if not then, at the next meeting of the Senate. I wish to accommodate myself to the convenience of the Senate, and at the same time I do not desire to have my remarks dribble along, a little to-day and a little to-morrow, so that I shall not have concluded until the end of two or three weeks.

I am not speaking against time. I am trying to present something that is interesting. I have a good deal more yet to come. I wish to devote a good deal of time to two particular articles—wool and sugar—and I think it is important to the Senate and to the country and to all the interests concerned that whatever any of us have to say seriously and earnestly, upon those two subjects especially, ought to be permitted to be said in a reasonable time. I am perfectly willing to accommodate myself to the convenience of the Senate now or in the hereafter.

Mr. HARRIS. I take it for granted the Senate wishes to accommodate itself to the convenience of the Senator. If he prefers to go on at the next meeting of the Senate, I apprehend there will be no objection to his discontinuing his remarks now and continuing them at the next meeting.

Mr. PEFFER. I do so desire.

Mr. ALDRICH. That, I presume, will not interfere with the notices that have been given heretofore by other Senators.

[Mr. PEFFER'S speech will be published entire after it shall have been concluded. See Appendix.]

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALDRICH. On that motion I ask that the vote be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRIS. I beg the Senator from Alabama to withdraw the motion for a single moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama insist upon his motion?

Mr. MORGAN. I do not.

Mr. ALDRICH. I did not understand what the Senator from Alabama said.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Alabama has withdrawn the motion.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Chair asked whether the Senator from Alabama insisted upon his motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair was perhaps unable to hear the Senator from Alabama distinctly.

Mr. MORGAN. I withdrew my motion in favor of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. The pending bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and has not been read. When I asked that the formal reading be dispensed with, it was objected to. I now ask that the reading of the bill may proceed.

Mr. ALDRICH. Pending that, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HARRIS. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HALE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. RANSOM].

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. HILL]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], who is absent. I do not know how he would vote, and I do not know how I should vote if he were here.

Mr. SHOUP (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from California [Mr. WHITE]. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES], and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHANDLER. Upon this question I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY].

Mr. GALLINGER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS], whom I do not see in his seat. Hence I have not voted. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. FRYE. I am paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired generally with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], but I have paired him with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON], who is now absent, and they will stand paired. I vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], who I see is absent. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] announced a pair. Will it be convenient to him that we transfer our pairs and both vote?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have no objection.

Mr. HARRIS. I vote "nay."

Mr. GALLINGER. I vote "yea."

Mr. CALL. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. BLACKBURN. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. In his absence I will transfer my pair to my colleague [Mr. LINDSAY], and vote "nay."

Mr. DANIEL. I am paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. SQUIRE]. If he were here, I should vote "nay." If any Senator on the other side of the Chamber wishes to transfer pairs, I shall be glad to know it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Did the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] announce that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON]?

Mr. COCKRELL. I did.

Mr. ALDRICH. The junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] is paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON], and was so paired this morning. Both Senators from Iowa were paired with the Senator from Georgia this morning upon one vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. The junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] informed me to day that he has a standing pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON].

Mr. COCKRELL (after having voted in the negative). I was told by our friend who keeps the list of pairs that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] was not paired with anybody, and therefore I announced the pair. I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CAREY (after having voted in the affirmative). I should like to inquire whether the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY] has voted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted, the Chair is advised.

Mr. CAREY. I am paired with that Senator, and withdraw my vote.

Mr. MCPHERSON (after having voted in the negative). I voted "nay," but I am reminded that I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HIGGINS], who does not seem to be present. I wish, therefore, to withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 9, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—9.

Aldrich,	Davis,	Gallinger,	Shoup,

Dubois,	Lodge,	Power,
Faulkner,	McLaurin,	Proctor,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No quorum has voted.

Mr. ALDRICH. No quorum appearing, I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. Upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays; and I shall not take the time to suggest that I did not suppose the filibustering would commence so early.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Tennessee is out of order. I did not suppose this disorder would commence so early.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to state that debate is not in order.

Mr. ALDRICH. Debate is not in order, but the Senator from Tennessee has debated the question, and I wish to state that there is no filibustering on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. BLACKBURN. By what name do you call it?

Mr. ALDRICH. The absence of a quorum on the other side has forced the situation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island, that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the call of the roll take place.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The roll will be called for the purpose of ascertaining whether a quorum is present.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Daniel,	Harris,	Perkins,
Allen,	Davis,	Hawley,	Pettigrew,
Bate,	Dolph,	Hoar,	Pugh,
Berry,	Frye,	Jones, Ark.	Ransom,

Cockrell,	Gray,	Palmer,	Voorhees,
Coke,	Hale,	Pasco,	Washburn.
Cullom,	Hansbrough,	Peffer,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Forty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question recurs upon the motion of the Senator from Rhode Island that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business; on which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CHANDLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY].

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS].

Mr. POWER (when his name was called). Has the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted, the Chair is advised.

Mr. POWER. I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY], and withhold my vote.

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I should vote "nay" if he were here.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS (after having voted in the negative). I voted inadvertently. I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], who is absent. The junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] announced a pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL]. Will it be agreeable to him to transfer our pairs?

Mr. LODGE. I am perfectly willing to transfer my pair to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. HARRIS. Then I will let my vote stand.

Mr. LODGE. I vote "yea."

Mr. RANSOM. The Senator from Montana [Mr. POWER] announced his pair with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY], and I announced mine with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I propose that we transfer our pairs.

Mr. POWER. Very well.

Mr. RANSOM. I vote "nay."

Mr. POWER. I vote "yea."

Mr. GIBSON. I have a general pair with the Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE]. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD], and I vote "nay."

Mr. CAREY. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY], and I withhold my vote.

Mr. McPHERSON. While I am paired with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HIGGINS], I am permitted to vote upon such questions, and I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 11, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—11.

Aldrich,	Davis,	Hoar,	Power,
Allen,	Dolph,	Lodge,	Washburn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The roll call discloses the lack of a quorum.

Mr. HARRIS. It is obvious there is no voting quorum here at present, and there is but one of two things that we can do with propriety, as it seems to me, at this hour of the evening—either to move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators or to adjourn. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 37 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, April 7, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 6, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

REPORT OF EXCISE BOARD, WASHINGTON, D. C.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the report of the excise board for the District of Columbia, transmitted in compliance with section 2 of the act approved March 3, 1893; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (S. 1680) to amend an act approved January 31, 1881, entitled "An act to more effectually suppress gambling in the District of Columbia," etc.; in which the concurrence of the House was requested; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

PAN-AMERICAN MEDICAL CONGRESS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following concurrent resolution of the Senate:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed and bound in cloth, of the proceedings of the Pan-American Medical Congress, held in Washington City, in September, 1893, under the authority of a joint resolution of Congress approved July 18, 1892, 10,000 copies; of which 2,000 shall be for the use of the Senate, 4,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 4,000 for distribution by the Department of State; the same to be indexed under the direction of the Committee on Printing.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask consent for the present consideration of that resolution.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CAUSEY, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. TALBOTT of Maryland, for to-morrow, on account of important business.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER, HASTINGS, MINN.

Mr. HALL of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5803) to authorize the city of Hastings, Minn., to construct and maintain a wagon bridge over the Mississippi River.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read at length.

The committee recommend the following amendment:

On page 1, section 1, line 9, after the word "Minnesota," insert "or at such point in said city as the city council thereof, with the approval of the Secretary of War, may direct."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was accordingly considered, the amendment agreed to and the bill as amended ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and being engrossed it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HALL of Minnesota, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

NOTIFICATION TO PENSION CLAIMANTS.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The title of the joint resolution will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H. R. 161) requiring attorneys and claim agents having offices in the District of Columbia, who have undertaken or shall undertake to prosecute claims for pensions, to advise each of the claimants once every three months as to the condition of his or her claim.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask for objection.

The joint resolution was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the gentleman if this resolution has been referred to and reported by a committee?

Mr. BRODERICK. No, sir. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

Mr. SAYERS. This seems to be a very important resolution. I think it ought to go to a committee so as to have a report upon it.

Mr. BRODERICK. I hope there will be no objection, but if there is I suppose it should go to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. That would be a proper reference.

Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SAYERS. There is.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

YELLOWSTONE NATIONAL PARK.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 5293) concerning leases in the Yellowstone National Park.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and empowered to lease to any person, corporation, or company, for a period not exceeding ten years, parcels of land in the Yellowstone National Park, of not more than 10 acres in extent for each tract and not in excess of 20 acres in all to any one person, corporation, or company, on which may be erected hotels and necessary outbuildings: Provided, That such lease or leases shall not include any of the geysers or other objects of curiosity or interest in said park, or exclude the public from free and convenient approach thereto or include any ground within one-eighth of a mile of any of the geysers or the Yellowstone Falls, the Grand Canyon, or the Yellowstone River, Mammoth Hot Springs, or any object of curiosity in the park: And provided further, That such leases shall not convey, either expressively or by implication, any exclusive privilege within the park except upon the premises held thereunder and for the time therein granted. Every lease hereafter made for any property in said park shall require the lessee to observe and obey each and every provision in any act of Congress, and every rule, order, or regulation made, or which may hereafter be made and published by the Secretary of the Interior concerning the use, care, management, or government of the park, or any object or property therein, under penalty of forfeiture of such lease, and every such lease shall be subject to the right of revocation and forfeiture, which shall therein be reserved by the Secretary of the Interior: And provided further, That persons or corporations now holding leases of ground in the park may, upon the surrender thereof, be granted new leases hereunder, and upon the terms and stipulations contained in their present leases, with such modifications, restrictions, and reservations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

This act, however, is not to be construed as mandatory upon the Secretary of the Interior, but the authority herein given is to be exercised in his sound discretion.

That so much of that portion of the act of March 3, 1883, relating to the Yellowstone Park as conflicts with this act be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. I reserve the right to object——

Mr. BURROWS. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if this bill has been reported from a committee?

Mr. HAYES. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. Let it be understood that objection is reserved.

Mr. BURROWS. What committee reports it?

Mr. HAYES. The Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. BURROWS. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. HAYES. It is.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. If my colleague will permit me, I will state that this is unanimously reported by the committee and approved by the Secretary of the Interior and everyone connected with the park. I know all of the facts in this case.

Mr. BURROWS. I will reserve the right of objection until the gentleman from Iowa makes such statement as he may desire to make in connection with it.

Mr. HAYES. I will explain briefly what this bill is. It relates to the leasing of land for hotel purposes in the Yellowstone Park. Under existing law only 10 acres can be leased. That ground is already leased, and it fails to provide for the comfort and convenience of tourists, there being 130 miles of traveled roads in the park, and as a result more leases are needed and more hotel accommodations. This is primarily asked by the superintendent of the park.

Mr. BURROWS. Under existing law, then, only 10 acres can be leased?

Mr. HAYES. Yes; and that is already leased, and fails to provide the necessary accommodations.

Mr. BURROWS. And this is to enlarge the powers of the Secretary, so that he may lease other ground?

Mr. HAYES. Yes, not exceeding 20 acres to any one person. As I have stated, this relief was asked by the superintendent. This bill is prepared so as to protect the Government in all its rights, and to provide for the convenience of tourists and travelers in the park. The Secretary of the Interior reports that the interests of the Government covered by the bill are amply protected, and upon that report is based the unanimous report of the committee. It is something that there seems to be no doubt about.

Mr. BURROWS. I have no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. Is there any provision for the payment of rental to the Government?

Mr. HAYES. Yes, the Secretary of the Interior imposes such conditions as he sees fit about that.

Mr. DINGLEY. As a matter of fact is there any rental paid?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. There is a nominal rental charged.

Mr. McRAE. Only a nominal rental.

Mr. COOMBS. I understand that only 10 acres in all can now be rented in the park?

Mr. HAYES. Twenty, under the present bill.

Mr. COOMBS. You said 20 to one individual.

Mr. DINGLEY. It seems to me that the Yellowstone Park is too important a public reservation to be trenched upon without the utmost care, and I hope the gentleman will let this bill go over until to-morrow.

Mr. DUNN. I should like to inquire what number of 20-acre leases may be granted?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. The bill authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to increase the area from 10 to 20 acres. The hotels now fully occupy the 10 acres, and two more hotels are needed to complete the circuit for the accommodation of the public.

Mr. DUNN. How many leases would there be altogether?

Mr. HAYES. That is in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. I have a letter from the president of the Yellowstone Park Association to the Committee on Public Lands, which explains these questions, and I will put it in the RECORD.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 29, 1894.

To the House of Representatives Committee on Public Lands:

GENTLEMEN: The bill concerning leases in the Yellowstone Park is so short and simple as not to require any particular elucidation. It grants no right directly, except the authority given to the Secretary of the Interior; that is, after the bill becomes a law nothing is conferred upon any person, corporation, or company by it.

Shortly after the park was opened, I think in 1883, certain lessees of the Government claimed the exclusive right to the whole park. It was a subject of debate in Congress and resulted in a declaration by act of Congress declaring all exclusive rights void that had been granted, and confining and restricting the amount that might be leased to any one person to 10 acres of ground. When the park came to be developed this amount was found to be obviously insufficient. All visitors to the park go there for the purpose of seeing its many and celebrated objects of interest. To do so, they have to travel around a circle of 130 miles, and this requires a series or chain of hotels at convenient points along the circuit.

The hotels at these different localities of the dimensions required by all tourists will in every case cover more than 10 acres. If these hotels are owned by different persons or corporations they can not be operated with advantage, either to the owners or to the public. This, I believe, is uniformly conceded by the persons going to the park. But there has been an extreme jealousy, owing probably to the claim of original lessees to the exclusive right in the whole park, against granting any large amount of land in any one lease. The Yellowstone Park Association own six leases made to it in 1889, and its hotels now cover the entire 10 acres allowed to it by law. It is very clear that it can not legally hold any more land, yet everybody who has ever visited the park, I believe without exception, considers that another hotel ought to be built at Upper Geyser Basin, and that it should be built as soon as possible.

In addition to this, while the park was still in its wild state, a law was passed forbidding any lease within one-quarter of a mile of any geyser or other object of curiosity. The local situation of the Upper Geyser is such that this distance precludes the building of a hotel at that place as long as this law exists. During the past six years a number of acts have been introduced in each House of Congress reducing the prohibited distance to one-eighth of a mile. In all the contentions which have arisen regarding the granting of leases within the park or its management and control, or the actions of the Yellowstone Park Association, or any other lessees, and in all the controversies concerning the park, no objection has been made, so far as I know, against the restriction of the prohibited distance to one-eighth instead of one-quarter mile, nor is there any diversity of opinion among all those who have visited the park, that the proper place to build a hotel at Upper Geyser Basin is where the present old hotel, or shack, stands, and which is within the present prohibited distance of one-quarter of a mile.

This short bill simply authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to make leases for ten years to the extent of 20 acres in all, and not to be within one-eighth of a mile of any of the curiosities of the park. I will say here that while the Yellowstone Park Association has exhausted the limit allowed to it by the present law of 10 acres, which are covered by its buildings and can not in law hold, nor can the Secretary of the Interior grant to it any right whatever to the hotel site at Upper Geyser Basin, it controls a lease for 10 acres of ground to the Hendersons, at Mammoth Hot Springs. If this bill is passed it expects to give up the greater part of that lease to the Government and to obtain for the portion surrendered a new location at Upper Geyser Basin. In short it is not the intention to ask the Secretary of the Interior to lease to it any more than is now leased by the Government.

This can not be said to be a bill for the relief of the association, although it would obtain relief from it, because any other person or corporation would have the same rights to new leases before the Secretary of the Interior that the association would have. Except the curtailment of the prohibition as to distance and the enlargement of the total amount allowed to be leased, the present bill is the same as the existing law of Congress. The matter was before this committee on an investigation ordered by the House about eighteen months ago. On page 65 of the evidence taken by this committee and reported to the House, Secretary Noble says that a hotel is needed at the Upper Geyser Basin and admits that it should be built on the site of the present shack hotel, and which is now used as a dinner station. The association has repeatedly and in writing assured the Department of the Interior, and during the said investigation it assured this committee, that it would make no objection whatever to any other person or corporation building the required new hotel at Upper Geyser Basin.

I reiterate that statement now. But for the past three years no person would come forward to do anything of the kind. The association would not propose to do anything of the kind. The association would not propose anything of the kind now, but for the fact that the hotel is necessary to its system or chain of hotels in the park. I state also the important fact that, while this hotel has been so badly needed and the demand is unanimous and emphatic, that not a lease has been taken out or applied for, nor has a hammer been struck in the park on any material improvement for the last three years. On the contrary, the development of the park has been completely paralyzed by contentions between the association and Secretary Noble and by the inaction of Congress in changing the present law as to the prohibited distance of one-quarter of a mile. And I think I may safely say it will remain in that condition until something is done by Congress.

This bill appears here with the approval of the Department of the Interior, and I am ready to answer any questions concerning it, or any objections to its recommendation by this committee. I will state for the information of the committee that for seven years past various bills providing for the improvement of the park and other matters concerning it have been before Congress at every session, but not one of them has been passed. As far as I know other parties having propositions concerning the park in other directions have no opposition to the passage of this bill. If they have I would like to know what the objections are in order that I may answer them. If no objection is made I request the committee to recommend the bill for passage without delay.

This bill is recommended by the present Secretary of the Interior, both in his annual report for 1893, and in his special letter to this committee.

CHARLES GIBSON,
President Yellowstone Park Association.

Mr. DINGLEY. I hope this will go over for a day.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I hope the gentleman from Maine will not ask for delay. This is very necessary, and needed now.

Mr. DUNN. I think there should be further time for consideration, and I object.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. They have been suffering for this right for a long time, and this is proposed for the benefit of the public. It does not carry a dollar of appropriation. It is simply to give them room to build hotels where they are needed. I was all over the ground last summer and know the necessity for this. We had to travel 20 miles extra for the want of a hotel at the Upper Geyser Basin. A hotel is badly needed there.

Mr. DINGLEY. I think, in passing bills of this nature by unanimous consent without an opportunity to consider them, we are sometimes in danger of failing to make proper provision for the protection of the public interest in such a great public reservation as this. Such failure may be without any intention. I should be glad to have this bill lie over until to-morrow, until further opportunity is given to examine it. But at the same time, if there is no one else who desires to object, I will take the statement of my friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] that the interests of the public and the Government are protected.

Mr. COOMBS. I should like to have the bill lie over.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I will say to the gentleman that the interests of the Government are thoroughly protected. I have examined the matter with great care, and it is approved by the Secretary of the Interior. The superintendent of the park recommended this. Secretary Noble recommended the same thing when he was Secretary of the Interior, and there is no conflict of opinion in respect to the necessity. I am personally familiar with the matter, and I hope that no objection will be made to its present consideration.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will not delay it on my own account, but will take the statement of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DUNN. I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. COOMBS. While I should be glad to have further opportunity to examine the matter, I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. REED. Now that the bill is up for consideration, I should like to hear an explanation of it.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I will be glad to make a further statement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] is recognized.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, at present there are four large hotels in the park. I wish this map I hold in my hand were large enough to exhibit them so that all the members could see. The first one, at the entrance to this great park, is called the Mammoth Hotel, at the Hot Springs, at the Grand Terraces. It is an immense hotel, almost equal in size and accommodations to the best hotels you will find in Long Branch, Cape May, or Atlantic City. They have expended over $500,000 on those hotels. Starting from that hotel in coaches that can not be surpassed in comfort by anything on the American continent, you pass through the Golden Gate, a place of wonder, where men of courage even close their eyes in passing over the bridge, although you would be as safe as the babe in the lap of its mother. Then you come to the Norris Basin, where there is a lunch house, and on the evening of the first day's ride you reach the Fountain Hotel, where you enter the Great Basin of the Geysers. On this day's trip you can drink from springs of pure Apollinaris water.

I remember as we were riding immediately on the top of a mountain before descending to this hotel and looking over that vast valley, it seemed as though 100,000 camp fires were burning. The steam of these geysers gives you something of the idea of a great army encamped and the smoke arising from their camp fires. The next day, leaving the Fountain Hotel, you go 10 miles to the upper geyser. Earth has no wonders or beauties approaching this region. "Hell's Half Acre" itself will hold you for days examining the wonders and splendors of that park. [Great laughter.]

Mr. RAY. Is that the Democratic park?

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. You may be in hell before you will appreciate the wondrous beauty of that park unless you can see it. [Great laughter.]

"Hell's Half Acre" has a fearful sound, but it is a congregation of beauties. Here is a lake of hot water containing in its bed all the beauties of the rainbow, with each hue intensified in its beauty. One spring constantly throws up a chain of bells perfect in form. Here, too, is found the monster geyser of the Yellowstone. It only speaks at the end of a six-year period, but then it speaks in thunder tones and continuously for six months, throwing up water in such great volume as to carry terror to the looker on. It casts great bowlders, weighing many tons, into the air for hundreds of feet, playing with them as if they were little pebbles. The waters from this geyser forms a boiling river and flows continuously, even when the geyser is not in action.

At the end of a 10-mile ride we come to "Old Faithful" Geyser, that throws water up every fifty-five minutes, and so high that you fancy the top of the column touches the clouds. There, too, you find the "Lion," the "Lioness," and "The Cubs," and other geysers. It is simply a wonderful field of attractions, that human language can not describe. This hotel, or shack rather, where we take lunch, is where they want the new hotel; and this bill is to provide for building it. The 10 acres, now the limit, are occupied by the other four hotels. This is to enable them to build a hotel at the Upper Geyser. Now, you have to go over the same track and back to the Fountain Hotel to spend the second night, and have to go over the same ground the next morning, making the trip three times, which would only have to be done once if you had a hotel at the Upper Geyser Basin. From that you go to the Great Lake, and when I tell you that that is a vast lake nearly 30 miles in length, on the top of a great mountain range miles higher than New York City, and where you can stand and fish and catch trout——. [Cries of "Oh, no;" and laughter].

Mr. GEAR. It is 6,000 feet.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Did I say six miles? [Great laughter.] There was only one gentleman who knew it. [Renewed laughter.] It is, I think, 6,000 feet higher than New York. When I tell you that there is a lake there 30 miles in length, and that I have stood on the edge of it and caught trout and thrown them over into a crater [great laughter], you gentlemen are learning something you will never learn again without you go there. [Renewed laughter.] You can catch trout in the lake and swing them into the crater and boil them on your hook [great laughter] and cook them to suit your taste. [Laughter.] I want to say to the fishermen here, and there are many water ducks in this House, that you can throw a line into the Yellowstone River with six hooks and bring out six trout at once. [Boisterous laughter.] I have done it [renewed laughter], and that is no fish story [Great laughter.] You gentlemen who do not know the glory of fine fishing do not believe this. Go and see, and you will find how dense your ignorance is touching the wonders of your own country.

But I want to tell you of something else that I found on that lake that gave me especial pleasure. I found there a steamboat equal in accommodations and splendor to any that you will find upon the Potomac or the Chesapeake, which was taken through the Golden Gate in sections and which was made, every particle of it, in the foundries of my own city. I had the pleasure of riding on that steamboat in that great lake on the top of the mountain. Passing from this, you come to the hotel by the wonder of the world, the Grand Cañon. To describe that human language has proved inadequate. [Cries of "Try it."] I have stood by that Grand Cañon at an elevated point and I have looked down and seen the eagles standing by their nests far above the bottom of the cañon below, and they looked like sparrows, although their wings from tip to tip measured 7 feet. The Yellowstone River passing along at the bottom of the cañon was like a quivering thread, though it had all the ambition and impetus of Niagara, lacking only its volume. On every side there are beauties in the sand along the face of this cañon that baffle the pencil of the greatest artist. At one place rocks that look like veiled nuns are grouped together as though worshiping the God that created that wonderful cañon. [Applause.] Oh, I can go on explaining this bill for hours if you want me to. [Laughter.]

At the Grand Cañon there is only one difficulty: You are liable to lose your fresh meat for breakfast sometimes, because the bears come there with their cubs and break open the meat boxes and eat up the meat.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Tell us a bear story. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. My friend has just returned from Rhode Island and he wants something fanciful. [Laughter.]

Mr. SICKLES. He wants a bare story—the naked truth. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. He is getting it straight now. I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, when I was interrupted by my overflowing colleague from Iowa, that these hotels furnish all the accommodations that you can get in the hotels of our best cities. The best class of waiters, with "claw-hammer coats" and perfect deportment, together with the choicest things to eat, are found at these hotels, and this bill is for the sole purpose of granting such facilities as will permit the building of hotels sufficient in number to accommodate the public demand.

I want to say to you, gentlemen, that few of you know what the Yellowstone Park is. It is well named "Wonderland." I have visited the World's Fair, and we all know something of what that was; but, great as it was, that was only the work of simple, powerless man. The Yellowstone Park stands there a marvelous creation, as though God himself were a competitor for the first prize for wonderful productions, and earth furnishes no parallel to the splendors of that wonderful park. One of the noblest men in my own State, Mr. Henry L. Stout, a man who shoved a jackplane years ago in Dubuque for a living, and who is now the richest millionaire in Iowa, becoming so by honest industry, not by trusts or combinations or thieving—a man more silent than Grant, but with a heart that began to grow where the big heart of Grant stopped growing—Henry L. Stout, a man of few words, when he heard that I was going to visit the park last summer said: "It is the most wonderful thing on earth, and if it was anywhere in Europe they would build an impassable wall around it and open their treasuries to protect and beautify it."

The marvels of that park defy description, and I am glad that this House has had the wisdom to let this bill come up for consideration, in order that additional comforts may be provided for the people who visit that region, so that millions may enjoy a trip which will give them pleasure, education, and powers of language which even my friend from Maine [Mr. REED], who asked for this explanation, does not yet dream of. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I am satisfied with the explanation of the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I rise out of sympathy for my friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], because twenty years ago I felt exactly as he feels to-day; for, as a member of the Geological Survey under Prof. Hayden, I stood on the verge of that same lake and fished in it and drew a trout out at that same spot and threw it into the same hot pool. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Now, will you gentlemen believe it? [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. When I returned from that expedition, I know that every man to whom I undertook to describe it questioned my veracity [laughter], and my only object in rising now is to uphold the testimony of the gentleman from Iowa, although I must frankly confess that I caught only one trout instead of six at a cast. [Laughter.]

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. There are some commttee amendments which should be voted on first. If there be no objection, the amendments of the committee will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the amendment sent to the desk by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY].

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, after the word "years," in line 5, insert, "at such annual rental as the Secretary of the Interior may determine."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move further to amend by striking out the last proviso on the second page.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the proviso which the gentleman from Maine moves to strike out.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That persons or corporations now holding leases of ground in the park may, upon the surrender thereof, be granted new leases hereunder, and upon the terms and stipulations contained in their present leases, with such modifications, restrictions, and reservations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

Mr. DINGLEY. It will be noticed, Mr. Speaker, that all leases which may be granted hereafter of land within the Yellowstone Park are by this bill subject to revocation and forfeiture at the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. In the proviso which I move to strike out it is further provided that leases now existing may be renewed. Now, there is not attached to the continuation of existing leases any provision for revocation by the Secretary of the Interior. It seems to me that, whatever leases may be renewed as well as those that may be originally granted should, considering the public nature of this park, be subject to revocation by the Secretary of the Interior. The first proviso covers all cases of leases that may hereafter be granted.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. If a lease is renewed it seems to me that is practically a new contract——

Mr. DINGLEY. But I fear that this provision for revocation might not apply to existing leases which may be renewed.

Mr. HAYES. I think the gentleman is mistaken in that construction.

Mr. DINGLEY. If that is the fact I should be glad to be informed of it.

Mr. HAYES. This proviso contemplates that existing leases may be revoked and new leases granted "hereunder," which would make these new leases subject to all the provisions of this bill. Under these provisions the existing conditions may be carried into the new leases.

Mr. DINGLEY. What, then, is the object of authorizing the renewal of the leases?

Mr. HAYES. So that they may be entirely subject to the provisions of law proposed in this bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Why not leave the granting of leases to be determined by the other provisions of this bill, which expressly include the right of revocation? What I desire is that all leases which may be granted or renewed shall be subject to revocation by the Secretary of the Interior. Here is a great national park; and we ought not to grant to private persons any rights there which the Government may not at any time resume.

Mr. HAYES. Whenever the existing leases are surrendered and new ones taken, those new ones will become subject to this provision for revocation. It is provided that the holders of existing leases may be "granted new leases hereunder"—that is, under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. If that is the construction given to the language of the bill—and I desire that it shall go into the RECORD—if it is understood that existing leases which may be renewed, as well as new leases which may be granted, shall be subject to the provision for revocation, I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. HAYES. I think there is no doubt about that.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. The bill as it stands provides thoroughly for all forfeitures and protects every possible interest.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine being withdrawn, the question is on ordering the bill as amended to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would like to recognize the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY].

Mr. LACEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The bill (H. R. 6442) to protect the birds and animals in Yellowstone National Park, and to punish crimes in said park, and for other purposes, was read.

Mr. COFFEEN. I desire to introduce an amendment to this bill.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on granting unanimous consent for its consideration.

Mr. STORER. If there is a report, I hope it will be read before the question is taken on granting consent.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the report will be read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the amendment which the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. COFFEEN] proposes to introduce may be read before consent is given.

Mr. COFFEEN. I should be glad to state the substance of my amendment; and I must object to the consideration of the bill unless this amendment can be considered.

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for private agreement. The question is upon granting unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill. In the absence of objection the amendment can be read.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope it may be read.

The SPEAKER. And the report can also be read.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the amendment has reference to the boundaries of this park, I shall have to object.

Mr. COFFEEN. It has not. It has reference to holding a term of the Federal court for the State of Wyoming at the town of Sheridan, in the northern part of the State, near to this park, so that the facilities for reaching the Federal court may be increased.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill?

Mr. STORER. I object.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Regular order.

On April 5, 1894:

An act (H. H. 1919) authorizing the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company to bridge Caddo Lake at or near Mooringsport, La., and Cross Bayou, near Shreveport, La.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. LATIMER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled the bill (S. 1836) to give effect to the award rendered by the Tribunal of Arbitration at Paris, under the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, concluded at Washington, February 29, 1892, for the purpose of submitting to arbitration certain questions concerning the preservation of the fur seals; when the Speaker signed the same.

MESSENGER FOR THE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE.

Mr. RUSK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Fifty-third Congress. That the Doorkeeper of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase his present force by the employment of one additional messenger for the remainder of the present session, at the rate of $100 per month, and assign him as messenger to the Committee on Agriculture.

The Committee on Accounts, to whom was referred the foregoing resolution relating to the appointment of a messenger to the Committee on Agriculture, having considered the same, respectfully recommend its passage.

Mr. RUSK. The chairman of the Committee on Agriculture having reported to the Committee on Accounts that it is absolutely essential that he should have a messenger at the committee door during the balance of the session pending the consideration of matters before that committee, and in view of the fact that the Doorkeeper is not able to assign a messenger for duty there during the entire day, the committee have reported favorably the resolution.

I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, it is only necessary to say to the House that this action by the Committee on Accounts was indorsed in the early part of this session by unanimous resolution of the Committee on Agriculture, and it is absolutely necessary for the performance of the work of that committee that we should have a messenger who can be assigned to that room during the entire day. The committee has leave of the House to sit during the sessions of the House; the subcommittees are employed in their work, and it is utterly impossible for the committee to get along without the assignment of a messenger. At present we can only get one up to fifteen minutes of the assembling of the House.

We had a messenger assigned to the committee in the last Congress for the same reasons, and it is just simply a matter of absolute necessity in the performance of the business of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 71, noes 20.

Mr. BYNUM. No quorum.

The SPEAKER appointed Mr. BYNUM and Mr. RUSK as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 117, noes 28.

Mr. BYNUM. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

Mr. STONE of Kentucky. I renew it.

Mr. HATCH. I hope the gentleman from Kentucky will not insist on that.

Mr. STONE of Kentucky. I can not withdraw the point.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman makes the point that no quorum has voted.

Mr. HATCH. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 161, nays 42, not voting 150; as follows:

So the resolution was passed.

After the first roll call the following proceedings took place:

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be a misapprehension, and I desire to ask unanimous consent to correct it.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HATCH. I rise to ask unanimous consent to make a brief statement, that this is not an additional messenger——

The SPEAKER. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HATCH. I ask unanimous consent.

Mr. REED. Is this a roll call?

The SPEAKER. This is the end of the first call.

Mr. REED. There is a roll call going on, and after the severe treatment of the other day it would look rather queer to see it interrupted even by a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine objects.

Mr. REED. The "gentleman from Maine" did not object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not assume the attitude he does and then say he does not object, because he did.

Mr. REED. My statement is in the record and shows for itself.

The SPEAKER. And so is the statement of the Chair.

Mr. REED (continuing). And the people will be able to understand it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not assume that attitude——

Mr. REED (continuing). It is simply a question of veracity.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can not assume that attitude and at the same time avoid responsibility.

The Clerk will proceed with the call of the roll.

The roll call was resumed and concluded as above.
The following pairs were announced:
Mr. WILSON of West Virginia with Mr. DALZELL.
Mr. DENSON with Mr. WOOMER.
Mr. KRIBBS with Mr. BROSIUS.

Mr. SOMERS with Mr. SHERMAN.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. RUSK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON] calls for the regular order.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. O NEILL of Missouri. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman states that he rises to a question of privilege.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. In the St. Louis Republic of yesterday, in a published interview with Congressman MORGAN of Missouri, the following statement appears:

Besides, it was agreed by O'NEILL and Joy that where the intention of the voter could be ascertained his vote should be counted. Why should we violate the solemn agreement of Mr. O'NEILL? He could not break this agreement without dishonor, and he asked too much of Congress to do what his sense of personal honor precluded him from doing.

Concerning that statement, Mr. Speaker, the only agreement ever entered into between Mr. Joy and myself was, that when we found ballots where the voter had scratched simply the caption of the ticket or portions of the ticket, we would take that to be the intention of the voter to have erased that ticket and voted for the one that remained intact. In the brief furnished by Mr. Joy, on page 19, he gives a list of the described ballots that were to be counted according to that rule. (See page 755.)

On page 755 of the testimony, the rule that he refers to is mentioned in the testimony of Patrick Killoran, where Mr. Joy states:

It is agreed that the witness, Patrick Killoran, cast his ballot properly, and that the ballot was described in the record, and that this witness's ballot so described would have been counted for the contestant under the rule adopted later between the contestant and the contestee. And it is further agreed that all described ballots during the first three days and prior to the adoption of the rule shall be counted in accordance with the rule adopted afterwards in the count, as appears by the record.

An examination of the ballots, in number amounting to 21, claimed by Mr. Joy under that rule, will be found to bear out my statement. All of those ballots are of this class. Ballot 349–422 is claimed by me.

On the Democratic, People's, and Prohibition tickets, on each one of them there is a cross mark in the middle of the ticket: on the Republican ticket the name of M. Kotenay is scratched by horizontal lines, and there are no other scratches on the ticket.

On the other ballots you will find the same description. When I noticed this interview I telegraphed my attorney at St. Louis, Charles S. Broadhead, and I have just received from him the following telegram:

ST. LOUIS, MO., April 6, 1894.

To Hon. JOHN J. O'NEILL,
Washington:

In the O'Neill-Joy case the agreement to abide by the intention of the voter, as testified by him, related only to those cases where the caption or some portion of the face of the ballot was scratched, and did not relate to anything except what appeared on the face of the ballot. There was never an agreement that the intention of the voter should or might be taken as to all the ballots or any large proportion of them.

The agreement related wholly to the face of the ballot; that is, when the witness Maroney could not determine from the face of the ballot who it should be counted for, and the contestant and contestee could not agree, it was agreed to call and abide by the declared intention of the voter. The number of the ballot, where there was an agreement to take the intention of the voter, was taken down by the contestant and contestee, and when either party introduced the voter who was supposed to have voted that ballot, the party calling the witness announced: "This is one of the cases in which it was agreed to take and stand by the intention of the voter;" and in scarcely any such case was the witness cross-examined. He was simply asked who he intended to vote for, answered, and was discharged.

CHARLES S. BROADHEAD.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when the statement was made before the committee that I had agreed to be bound by the intention of the voters according as the tickets were found in the box, I stated to the committee that there was no such agreement. On the 23d of last October, immediately after that statement appeared, I published in the St. Louis Republican of that date the following:

Joy's statement that I had agreed to count every fraudulent ballot is such a stupid falsehood that it answers itself.

There is not in the entire record one iota of an agreement or statement that I have not lived up to. There is not in that record the testimony of a single witness that shows where a single fraudulent practice was used in my interest.

In the brief that I furnished to the committee I furnished instances of every conceivable kind of fraud that could be practiced at an election, and those instances were sufficiently frequent that the committee need never have referred to the laws of Missouri. They need never have discarded one single ballot on account of having not been initialed or numbered. If they had simply taken the overwhelming mass of proof of fraudulent votes, it would have given me my seat upon this floor.

I have borne patiently not only the misrepresentations and falsehoods in regard to this contest, but I have borne what is more. Under the surface my record on this floor as a Representative has been attacked in a cowardly and contemptible manner. I have been branded here—not openly, but covertly and quietly—as a firebrand, as a labor agitator, as one who, if seated in this House, would cause disturbances here. With one exception, there is not a bill that I ever presented in this House that did not pass the House by an almost unanimous vote, and to-day those bills are on the statute books of your country. The convict labor bill alone failed to pass, and that bill went to engrossment by an overwhelming vote. I want my status in this House established. I have been a representative of my people for over twenty years, and I have never been charged with either falsehood or dishonor.

My people for twelve years have unanimously nominated me for Congress. The people of my city know me. They have known me from the time when I traversed the streets of that city as a newsboy. They know me there as the son of an humble Irish laborer; and if to advocate the cause of the people from whom I sprung is to put me under the ban, then I am willing to retire from public life. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. I will yield to the gentleman for any question he desires to ask.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I simply desire to ask the Chair if this is a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman stated that he rose to a question of privilege.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Does the Chair hold that the gentleman has presented a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has finished his remarks, and no point has been made.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I supposed that the Chair sometimes took cognizance of the proceedings and admonished members as to whether a question of privilege had been presented.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not responsible for the gentleman's supposition.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me we have heard about enough of the O'Neill contested election case; and the gentleman, now having his seat, would do well to devote himself to the discharge of his Congressional duties for the performance of which Mr. Joy was elected by the voters of the Eleventh Congressional district of Missouri. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Now I have been referred to, and I think that I can speak on a question of personal privilege. I read from the election case of O'Neill vs. Joy, and I find this unmodified independent proposition made by Mr. O'NEILL:

Mr. O'NEILL. I am willing to take the intention of the voter right through.
Mr. JOY. When I can see the plain intention of the voter I am perfectly willing to take it.

I am not surprised that Mr. O'NEILL declined to take the intention of the voter.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Read the next line.

Mr. MORGAN (continuing). In this case.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. Read the next line.

Mr. MORGAN (reading):

By Mr. BATES. Either do that or describe it.

Mr. O'NEILL of Missouri. That is it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I ask the Chair if this debate is in order?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] rose and had read an extract from a paper, and stated that he rose to a question of privilege that covered the statement made in an interview purporting to be given by the gentleman's colleague [Mr. MORGAN]. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] was permitted to make his statement, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MORGAN], his colleague, is making his statement in reply.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Now, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has just stated that we have had sufficient of the O'Neill and Joy contested-election case, and I object.

The SPEAKER. But there has been a question raised, and the gentleman has been recognized to make a personal statement.

Mr. MORGAN. I admit that the interview was correct, as published in the St. Louis Republic.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I insist on my point of order, Mr. Speaker, which is that the question under consideration is not in order. Mr. O'NEILL has made his statement of the question of privilege, and that is the end of the case.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. O'NEILL] has had suggested some controversy as to the accuracy of the statement made.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I desire to have a ruling of the Chair. If I am right, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed in order, and confine himself to the question.

Mr. MORGAN. I will. I will read from the election case to show that what I stated was correct.

By Mr. O'NEILL. It is agreed and announced that where the intention of the voter is apparent, that the vote will be counted for the person for whom he intended to vote. It applies all through the entire ballot.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

That is the language of Mr. O'NEILL.

By Mr. JOY. Both parties agree to it.

[Renewed applause.]

And that is followed by other testimony, sustaining, as I understand, the proposition.

I did state that in that interview, when I was called upon to explain my vote, for having discarded the report of a Democratic committee. I never criticised its conclusions of law. I was called upon to explain the reason I voted against the unseating of Mr. Joy, being a Democrat, and I gave them. The gentleman did not read all the interview. I will read the remainder, as it is short.

I voted against turning Joy out because it appeared clear to me that he was fairly elected and received the certificate of election from the Democratic official of the State, who carefully canvassed the returns. No fraud was subsequently shown to set aside this solemn and authoritative action. It is a poor argument to say the Republican majority in former Congresses have disregarded the votes of the legal electors, overthrown the certificates of State boards of canvassers and turned out Democratic Representatives fairly elected. We should avoid the wrongs of the Republicans rather than repeat them.

It is bad politics to take advantage of mere technicalities to defeat the will of the people. We have had too much of this in election cases. We ought to do right, and the right thing was to allow Joy to remain in his seat.

I still adhere to those declarations. They are true. [Loud applause on the Republican side].

Now, Mr. Speaker, I beg pardon of the House for referring to this matter, and I hope we are done with the O'Neill contested-election case, because I think it more than we can stand. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees for reports.

CERTIFICATION OF CERTAIN CLAIMS.

Mr. BAILEY, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with a favorable recommendation a joint resolution (H. Res. 121) authorizing proper officers of the Treasury Department to examine and certify claims in favor of certain counties in Arizona; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PARTIAL PAYMENTS FOR WORK FOR REVENUE-MARINE SERVICE.

Mr. BAILEY also, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with an amendment a joint resolution (H. Res. 150) providing for partial payments for work, etc., for Revenue-Marine Service; which was referred to the Committee on the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

PROTECTION OF THE FLAG OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. LAYTON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with a favorable recommendation a bill (H. R. 5315) to prevent desecration of the United States flag; which was referred to the House Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

BELT RAILWAY COMPANY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, reported a bill (H. R. 6596) as a substitute for the bill (H. R. 5933) to amend the act approved February 18, 1893, changing the name of the Capitol, North O Street, and South Washington Railway Company to the Belt Railway Company, and granting additional powers to said company; which was referred to the Union Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

The original bill (H. R. 5933) for the same purpose was laid on the table.

The call of committees was completed.

TAXATION OF LEGAL-TENDER NOTES.

Mr. HALL of Missouri, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 4326) to subject to State taxation National bank-notes and United States Treasury notes, and asked that the bill and report be printed, together with the views of the minority, and recommitted to the committee.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry in regard to that. The bill that came to the committee from the House is not the one that is reported back. That bill was amended by the committee, and it is the amended bill that is authorized to be reported to the House.

The SPEAKER. Well, the gentleman, the Chair understands, has reported the bill that he was authorized to report.

Mr. SPRINGER. The report shows that the committee have recommended amendments. Of course the committee had to report back the bill that was referred to it by the House, but it is reported back with amendments, which appear in the report.

The bill, with the report and the views of the minority, was ordered to be printed, and recommitted to the committee.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution reported a while ago by the gentleman from Texas from the Committee on the Judiciary in regard to partial payments for work for the Revenue Marine Service.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is demanded. If that demand is withdrawn, the Chair will entertain the gentleman's request.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I will withdraw the demand for the regular order, Mr. Speaker, with the understanding that if the matter which the gentleman from New York desires to call up occasions debate, it will be withdrawn.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. I do not think it will occasion any debate.

PARTIAL PAYMENTS FOR WORK FOR REVENUE MARINE SERVICE.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of that joint resolution.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized to make partial payments from time to time upon all contracts for the construction of vessels for the Revenue Marine Service, but not in excess of the amount of the value of the work already done; and that the contracts shall provide for a lien upon such vessels for all advances so made.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, how does this come before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for its consideration at this time. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. I want to understand what it is before I consent.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. I shall be happy to inform the gentleman. For a great many years it has been the custom of the Treasury Department, on contracts for revenue marine vessels and other vessels constructed for that Department, to make partial payments. Under the contracts as they have been made heretofore the Government obtained no lien whatever upon a vessel by these partial payments, but had to rely entirely upon the bondsmen of the contractor. It was formerly understood that under section 3648 of the Revised Statutes authority was given to make these partial payments, but from a late opinion given by the Attorney-General it appears that partial payments can not be legally made; the Government does not acquire any property in the vessels. I have a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury requesting that this joint resolution be passed by Congress in order that these partial payments may be made from time to time as work progresses upon vessels which are being constructed for the Revenue Marine Service, the Light-House Service, and other branches of service connected with the Treasury Department.

It has been the regular custom of the Department for many years to make payments of this kind, but owing to the failure of one of the contractors the question has lately arisen whether partial payments should be made to the bondsmen who had been subrogated to the rights and obligations of contractors. The Treasury Department asked for the opinion of the Department of Justice on this question, and the Department of Justice has held that under the law as it exists to-day these payments can not be made.

This joint resolution simply provides that partial payments not exceeding 75 per cent of the work done may be made to the contractors as the work on these vessels progresses. As I have said, there has been a regular custom of making such payments, but these payments apart from the sanction which custom gave have been entirely outside of the law.

This resolution will not vary the practice which has prevailed for a great many years in the Treasury Department, but will simply make plain as a matter of law and right what the Treasury Department should do.

Mr. REED. Does this resolution provide that there shall be a lien for the amounts advanced?

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Yes, sir. It is provided that hereafter upon any vessel on which partial payments are made the Government shall have a lien for the amount advanced.

Mr. REED. And this does not in any way release the bondsmen?

Mr. LOCKWOOD. In no way.

Mr. REED. Does this resolution provide for any such case as where the bondsmen take possession of the vessel for the purpose of completing the contract?

Mr. LOCKWOOD. It does not.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Maine that one of the amendments offered by the committee would cover that precise point.

Mr. REED. So that, under this provision, advances could be made to the bondsmen when they undertake the fulfillment of the contract?

Mr. BAILEY. Whenever they undertake the work in place of the original contractors, they become subrogated to the rights of the contractors; and consequently these payments could be made to them.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LOCKWOOD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PRIVATE PENSION BILLS.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I call for the regular order.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON] to yield to me for a moment. I do not wish to call up any bill, but simply to submit a request.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I have expressed my request in writing. I send the paper to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

I ask unanimous consent that the previous question be considered as ordered on the consideration, third reading, engrossment, and passage of all private bills on the Calendar of Unfinished Business which have been reported to the House by the Committee of the Whole at Friday night sessions; subject to the reading and approval of the Journal, the calling of committees for reports, executive communications, messages from the Senate, the right of way of general appropriation bills, and also to existing special orders for eulogies; and fifteen minutes' debate on each side may be had on each bill; provided that this order shall not interfere with the regular order at Friday night sessions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that this order be made. Is there objection?

Mr. McMILLIN. Reserving the right to object, I wish to inquire whether the order, if adopted, will take precedence of all questions except those therein mentioned, and the appropriation bills?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I suppose it would.

Mr. McMILLIN. I see that the gentleman excepts from the operation of the order the very night set apart for the consideration of these bills. It strikes me that it is peculiar. It is a matter of questionable propriety to order the previous question on forty different measures at one time. I do not think it a good method of proceeding. Yet I dislike to make an objection which may seem to prevent the orderly consideration of these measures. If half an hour be devoted to each of these bills, assuming that the yeas and nays are not called, then whatever may be the exigency of other business, twenty hours would be devoted to the disposition of these bills.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I have tried to make this order broad enough to allow the taking up of these measures when no others are regularly before the House. I intend to observe entire good faith in that particular in asking the enforcement of the order. I do not wish to antagonize other business.

Mr. DOCKERY. Does the gentleman except from the operation of the order privileged reports?

Mr. McMILLIN. I ask that the order be again read.

The Clerk again read the request.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask the gentleman to except also privileged bills or privileged reports.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I accept that, and modify the resolution accordingly.

Mr. STALLINGS. I would like to have the gentleman give an explanation of the effect of this resolution.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. It simply means that the previous question shall be ordered upon the various bills that have been already considered and reported from the Committee of the Whole, with a view to taking them up for consideration when there is no business before the House of the kind specified in the exception.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Had not the gentleman better broaden the resolution, and let it apply to bills that shall be considered on Friday night sessions in the future, as well as those already considered?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I think we had better not undertake to do that.

Mr. REED. It probably could not be got through the House. The same influences that are against general pension bills would be against that.

Mr. PICKLER. I do not think this will help the matter very much.

Mr. REED. It is the best that could be done in this House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. HUTCHESON. I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. BLACK of Illinois until April 10, on account of important business.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to further consider general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the pending bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6016) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, against which the point of order is made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to modify the amendment which is now pending, offered by myself last evening, so as to read as follows.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That from and after the passage of this act all periodical publications, issued from a known place of publication at stated intervals and as frequently as four times a year, by or under the auspices of a benevolent or fraternal society or order organized under the lodge system and having a bona fide membership of not less than one thousand persons, or by a regularly incorporated institution of learning, or by or under the auspices of a trades union, and all publications of strictly professional or scientific societies shall be admitted to the mails as second-class matter, and the postage thereon shall be the same as on other second-class matter and no more: Provided further, that such matter shall be originated and published to further the objects and purposes of such society, order, trades union, or institution of learning, and shall be formed of printed paper sheets without board, cloth, leather, or other substantial binding such as distinguish printed books for preservation from periodical publications.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I make the same point of order, Mr. Chairman, against the modified amendment as I made against the original.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. This amendment is not germane to the subject-matter of the bill. The effect of the amendment is to make a permanent law. It is bound to change existing law; and if it is not for that purpose, it is an idle amendment.

In addition to that it does not reduce expenditures. On the contrary, it will greatly increase them.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] desires to be heard on the point of order, and I will give way to him for the present.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, I desire to address the Chair on the point of order which was made on yesterday by the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads against the original amendment introduced by the gentleman from Illinois, and is now renewed against the modified amendment, which point of order, if I understand it correctly, is that the amendment changes existing law without retrenching expenditure.

The gentleman from Illinois urges that it does not change existing law at all, and in order that the committee may understand that this is the view of the publishers of this class of periodicals, and that they contend now, and have always contended, that their newspapers are entitled to admission as second-class matter, I desire to read from a letter that I have received from the recorder of the Grand Lodge of the Ancient Order of United Workmen, in which it is stated:

First, I beg to assure you that fraternal beneficial societies, like the Ancient Order of United Workmen, the Royal Arcanum, the Knights of Honor, and many others, do not find so much fault with the ruling of the Post-Office Department, only that we feel that a wrong construction has been put on the law relating to newspapers published in the interests of this society.

Their claim is identical with the claim of the gentleman from Illinois. Incidentally, I desire to say that it seems to me that the Chair is placed in an unfortunate position by this point of order, for he is called upon to do precisely that of which we are complaining of the Post-Office Department. We are complaining that these newspapers have been subjected, not to the operation of the law as it exists, but to the operation of bureau-made law; and I think that most members of this House will agree with me that there is a good deal too much of bureau made law anyhow. The Third Assistant Postmaster-General, and the Assistant Attorney-General who serves in connection with the Department, and the Postmaster-General himself, know a good deal more about law in general than they do about newspapers: and if the observations which I shall bring to the attention of the Chair assist him in deciding this point of order, they may be of service, because I know a little about law and a little about newspapers, too.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] suspend for a moment? The Chair will take it as a personal favor, and a very great courtesy on the part of the committee, if members of the committee who are engaged in conversation on the floor will allow the Chair to hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. QUIGG. Now, I am going to confine myself strictly and literally to this point of order, and not to the contention whether or not it is desirable to send newspapers through the mails at a cheap rate of postage, not to the point whether the papers will burden the mail, not to the point whether too much money is being expended by the Government in this way, but strictly to the point of order. Those are questions that are quite aside from this.

I may say, in passing, that these publications must be admitted to be newspapers. They contain news. If anybody doubts that, I have a lot of them that are subject to examination. They are newspapers. They fulfill every requirement of the law, unless one, and it is to that one I am coming. I will inquire if the Chair has before him the law upon this subject?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has the law before him, and is following the question closely.

Mr. QUIGG. If the Chair will look at the law, he will see that the first statutory requirement is that the newspaper must be regularly issued at stated intervals, as frequently as four times a year; that it must bear a date of issue and be numbered consecutively. These newspapers fulfill all those conditions, do they not?

Second. It must be issued from a known office of publication. Well, there is no trouble about that. They are all issued from well-defined places of business.

Third. They must be formed of printed paper sheets without board, cloth, leather, or substantial bindings, such as distinguish printed books for preservation from periodical publications.

Well, they are not books or anything like books.

Fourth. It must be originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character or devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry, and have a legitimate list of subscribers.

Now, it may be said by some people, though it is not said by the Department, that these newspapers do not have a legitimate list of subscribers.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. That is just what the Department does say.

Mr. QUIGG. That claim is not urged by the Department.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. You are mistaken about that. That is one of the points the Department makes. I will call the gentleman's attention to the opinion of Mr. Tyner, Assistant Attorney-General under Mr. Harrison, and of Mr. Thomas, Assistant Attorney-General under Mr. Cleveland.

Mr. QUIGG. Then the Department has gone a long way farther from the law than I supposed it had. The Department is bound to the facts than I supposed it was.

There is no question here about these newspapers having legitimate lists of subscribers. That question ought not to be raised; but if it is going to be raised, I will speak about that. They all have subscribers, and those subscribers are furnished by a society. A society supplies a list of subscribers, who agree to receive the paper, and who pay the society for the paper.

Mr. DUNPHY. Is not the paper published by the society?

Mr. QUIGG. It may or may not be. In some instances it is not.

Mr. DUNPHY. The question that has come up in the Post-Office Department is whether the members of the society publishing the paper become legitimate, bona fide subscribers without paying anything else except their annual dues. They pay nothing except their annual dues, and the society, in consideration of those dues, sends them this fraternal journal.

Mr. QUIGG. That is what I am talking about. That is merely a method of collecting. The society acts as middleman, and collects the subscriptions from these subscribers, either by means of the regular dues of the society or by any other means that the society chooses to adopt, and forwards the subscriptions to the publisher of the paper, who may or may not be in the employ of the society. Sometimes it is an entirely independent concern. Many of these newspapers are published by individuals. The paper is the individual property of one man, and not the property of a society at all in some cases; but because he is a member of the society, and stands well with the society, that society adopts his newspaper as its organ. That is the case in several instances. In other cases the papers are published by the societies themselves, and the question raised by the gentleman is merely as to a method of collection.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. QUIGG. Yes.

Mr. LOUD. Do you not understand that this amendment proposed here will go beyond the cases you are arguing for and make it compulsory upon the Department to admit as second-class matter any journals published by the societies or organizations mentioned in this amendment, whether they have a legitimate circulation or not, or any circulation?

Mr. QUIGG. Why certainly not. If they have no circulation, they will not want to go through the mails.

Mr. LOUD. I mean legitimate circulation. I can issue a journal under this amendment simply as an advertising medium for a commercial college.

Mr. QUIGG. Oh, no.

Mr. LOUD. I can, under this proposed law, simply as an advertising medium, and not have a single subscriber.

Mr. QUIGG. Oh, no. I want to call the attention of the Chairman to this.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be obliged to members of the committee if they would allow the gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] to address the Chair to the conclusion of his remarks without interruption. The Chair will then recognize any gentleman who desires to present his views on this point of order. The Chair is very anxious to hear the gentleman from New York without further interruption.

Mr. QUIGG. The point made by the gentleman from California is that he can issue (and this bears on the question of order) a paper, and it does not make any difference whether he has any legitimate list of subscribers or not; it may simply be an advertising sheet, intended for the purpose of promoting his business, and that he can send it through the mails under this resolution. He can not do anything of the kind, for the simple reason that the law says very distinctly that no journal which is issued as an advertising medium, nor which has not a regular list of subscribers, can thus go through the mails.

That disposes of his supposititious case at once. Now, then, I come down to the point of whether a newspaper has a legitimate list of subscribers. What significance attaches to the use of the word "legitimate?" It is legitimate if they have to pay for them, is it not? Well, it makes no difference how they pay for them, then, provided they do pay for them. If they pay a middleman, and he transfers it to the office, that is paying for it. If they pay an agent of the newspaper, and the agent goes to the newspaper and pays it and takes off his commission, that is legitimate.

Suppose they pay it to the secretary of a society and he pays it into the fund, and the fund goes out to pay the expenses of the paper, what difference does it make? Is it not a legitimate list of subscribers? Of course it is. Then the final point is this, and I desire particularly to call the attention of the Chair to the preliminary expression which introduces this report:

Provided, however—

And I wish the gentleman in charge of the bill would do me the honor of listening to me at this point—

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. QUIGG. I say I will be obliged if the gentleman would give me his attention at this point. I want to make the point, and bring it closely to the gentleman's attention, that in the four statutory provisions in regard to these newspapers, after saying that the paper must be originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character, must be devoted to literature, science, or art, or special industries, and have a legitimate list of subscribers, before we come to the last qualification there are the words, "provided, however." In other words, sir, this last qualification is simply a qualification of that which has gone before:

Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit to second-class rates regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes—

Will the gentleman from California give heed to that—or for free circulation—

And that is not involved here, because it is a paid circulation—or for circulation at nominal rates.

Now, sir, this last qualification, "nominal rates," is all there is in this point of order; absolutely all. This is the law. Whatever else is in this subject, what the gentleman may insist is the law, necessarily may or may not be as we choose to decide. This is the Department view. That view is shown in a series of regulations, in which they have provided as to how a publisher shall define his newspaper in offering it for circulation at pound rates.

It appears that they have construed this provision in these words. "That the paper must be circulated when the publication is controlled by a society, association, or club, and is distributed among its members upon the payment of regular dues or of an assessment covering the cost of publication." Now, that is the construction of the Department as to the meaning of nominal rates. I want to say to the Chair again that that construction illustrates the fact with which I introduced my observations—that these lawyers in the Post-Office Department know a great deal more about law than they do about newspapers.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman please read that construction again?

Mr. QUIGG. Yes, sir.

When the publication is controlled by a society, association, or club, and is distributed among its members upon the payment of regular dues or an assessment covering the cost of publication.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman in charge of the bill says that the Department contends now, and he proposes to submit something in which the contention is urged, that these newspapers have no legitimate circulation. But that is an afterthought. That is the point which the Department has been relying upon, the reason it has been furnishing to these advertisers and publishers for keeping their publications out of the mails, and that is the last construction as to nominal rates. That is what it has been doing, whatever it may be saying to the House; and now that the subject is up, in its desire to prevent the House from doing what it may wish to do, is an afterthought. It does not put that in the design, or at least does not put it in the regulation. The regulation on the subject is what I have read to the Chair.

Now, as I say, these gentlemen know more about law than they do about newspapers, or they would see the point that if a literal construction were to be given to this word "nominal" it would bar out of the mails nearly every newspaper in the United States. Take, for instance, such newspapers as we have in New York—the Herald, the Tribune, the World, the Sun; the bills for the white paper on which they are printed amount at the end of the year to nearly as great a sum as they receive from subscriptions, so that their subscriptions are really all "nominal" in one sense. Mr. Chairman, when a man undertakes to argue about what Congress intended when it used certain language in making some expression of its will, the field for speculation is very wide. But if Congress meant anything sensible by the use of this word "nominal," in view of the fact that literally all the newspapers are circulated at nominal rates, it meant, and it must have meant, simply to provide that none of the newspapers that are included in these four classes should be allowed to sneak into the mails by charging a very trifling sum for subscription. That was what was meant by the use of the word "nominal," and that is what must have been meant, for it is used as a qualification of what goes before. The intention was to shut out advertising sheets, sheets designed to promote individual interests——

Mr. CUMMINGS. Ayer's Sarsaparilla, for instance.

Mr. QUIGG. Yes; any publication that is designed to promote the interests of a particular business. There are large dry-goods firms in New York City that issue papers and try to get them through the mails, although their sole purpose is to advertise the business of those firms. My colleague from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] has mentioned another concern that does the same thing.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Yes. They print a million copies.

Mr. QUIGG. I believe so. Now, the law was intended to prevent the accomplishment of any such thing as that, to prevent those papers from getting access to the mails at newspaper rates by making a slight charge for subscription and circulating as newspapers, when they were really advertising sheets intended to be circulated free. But these newspapers that have been excluded do not circulate for nothing. It costs a great deal of money to print them. Here is one of them, the fraternal kind, against which this prohibition is being urged.

You see it is an 8-page paper almost entirely composed of news. It has general advertisements on the back, and anybody in the world can get into it as an advertiser if he has a legitimate industry to advertise. That is the character of all these publications. They are newspapers if there ever was a newspaper. They are just as much newspapers as the religious publications that are circulating through the mails at pound rates, and obviously the only intention of the law in using the word "nominal," which is used as a qualification of what precedes it, was to provide against the evasion of the law by publications of the several characters described—to provide that a publication which does not appear at stated intervals, that a publication which is not published as often as four times a year, that a publication which does not bear a date, that a publication which is not numbered consecutively, that a publication which is not issued from a known office, that a publication which is not printed as a newspaper but as a book, that a publication which is not originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character or devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry—the intention, I say, was to provide that none of these so-called newspapers should gain access to the mails at the pound rate by simply sticking on some trifling charge for subscription. That is the meaning and the whole meaning of the word "nominal" as there used.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit that it must be clear to you, as it certainly ought to be clear to the committee, that these papers to which I have heretofore called attention have been forbidden access to the mails upon a narrow and an incorrect construction of the law. The lawyers who read that word "nominal" did not know what it meant as there used. That is all there is of it, and it is nothing unusual for lawyers not to know what things mean. [Laughter.] They make mistakes all the time, like other people.

Mr. LOUD. Does the gentleman say that this paper, the Fraternal Times, is denied access to the mails as second-class matter?

Mr. QUIGG. I am so informed.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman is mistaken. Here is a statement printed right on the face of the journal itself: "Entered as second-class matter at the New York post-office July 18, 1889."

Mr. QUIGG. It may have printed that on its face, and yet may have been denied access to the mails afterward.

Mr. LOUD. There are only two papers that are denied access to the mails, and this, as I have said, is not one of them, for it bears the inscription I have just read.

Mr. SPRINGER. That does not necessarily show that it is allowed to go through the mails, though.

Mr. CUMMINGS. The official organ of the National Typographical Union is denied the privilege of the mails.

Mr. LOUD. That is all right.

Mr. CUMMINGS. It is all wrong, and you know it.

Mr. QUIGG. Now, Mr. Chairman, I dare to say that the gentleman from California is mistaken in what he has just stated.

The gentlemen who have sent me these papers as samples of the papers that have been denied access to the mails are not lying to me or imposing upon me; they are honorable gentlemen; and the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] is mistaken in his statement. They know whether their papers have been denied access to the mails much better than the gentleman from California does.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me a single statement?

Mr. QUIGG. With pleasure.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. The legislation now in question originated in the first session of the Forty-third Congress. I was at that time a member of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, was chairman of the subcommittee having this matter under consideration, and I had charge of the legislation during its passage through this House. The matter was discussed very fully at that time in the committee and in the House; and it never entered the minds of that committee to suppose that the legislation would be so construed as to exclude from the mails this class of papers.

Mr. QUIGG. I hope the Chair will give due heed to what has just been stated on the personal knowledge of the chairman of the subcommittee that originally had charge of this legislation.

Mr. SWANSON. These papers were all admitted at one time under the existing law.

Mr. BOWERS of California. The gentleman from New York [Mr. QUIGG] will allow me to suggest that I am in receipt of many communications in regard to this very paper to which he has referred. I am a member of that organization, and members of it have written to me that their paper is denied passage through the mails as second class matter.

Mr. QUIGG. I am sure it will not be supposed that I entertain a single thought of disrespect to the intelligence or good humor of the Chair in this matter, but I am very anxious that the Chair, in deciding this point, should keep out of its mind any other question than the point of order raised here.

If the occupant of the chair thinks that the mails are now too largely burdened with newspapers, and that there ought to be a retrenchment of expenditures in this respect, I trust he will not allow any such consideration to have anything to do with the determination of the question of order. Such considerations have had a great deal to do with the ruling adopted in the Post-Office Department and a great deal to do with this bureau-made law. We are the judges—not the Third Assistant Postmaster-General—of how much money we want to spend in circulating newspapers through the mails. He will do us a favor if he will allow us to express our opinion on that subject. He is our servant to carry out our will—not our master to qualify it and narrow it down. This is all I have to say. [Loud applause.]

Mr. AITKEN. Mr. Chairman, this question of order, as I understand, turns solely on the question whether it is a rule of the Department or a law that is to be changed in this case. I have had some experience with the Department, which I think will show that it is merely a rule of the Department. I happen to be interested in the circulation of one of these fraternal journals which have been ruled out of the mails, although it was labeled as having been entered as second-class matter. I appeared before the Third Assistant Postmaster-General in connection with this question—and I will say it was not during the present Administration. That officer immediately rang a bell, sent down into the basement, and brought up a young man who listened to what I had to say on this question. Then turning to the young man, the Third Assistant Postmaster-General asked him whether I had satisfied him that he had made a mistake in his ruling. The young man stated that he was not convinced; and so the Third Assistant told me that the matter would have to rest as it was.

As I wanted an authoritative determination of the Department on the question, I went with the case to the Postmaster-General; for I took it for granted it was a ruling of the Department that we wanted to have changed. We finally got the question before Judge Tyner as attorney for the Post-Office Department. The question was argued pro and con. Those who were contending for the construction adopted by the Department brought in rulings of Judge Tyner's which they claimed, if applied to this paper, would rule it out as second class matter. After a long discussion, lasting some two days, Judge Tyner ruled in this particular case that the paper was entitled to pass through the mails as second-class matter, thus setting aside the ruling of the gentleman in the basement and that of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

Now, I take it, it is simply a rule that we wish to establish in the Post-Office Department. We claim, as the gentleman from New York has said, that the law admits these papers as second-class matter, and that these societies which represent millions of people in this country, should not have their legal rights denied because of the opinion or prejudice of those in authority in the Post-Office Department.

Many of us know how these papers are circulated. These fraternal orders are not organized for profit. They have been designated by the courts all over this country as charitable institutions rather than institutions for profit. They make their laws by representatives chosen by members of the local bodies; when those representatives get together they decide whether it is best that each of the membership should receive a copy of the society paper in order that information relating to the society may be properly promulgated. If they make up their minds that the interests of the society require the circulation of these papers they instruct the committee, or some officer representing them, to go to some publisher and contract with him to furnish to each member of the order a copy of the journal in question, which is designated by their laws as the official organ of the order.

In the case I have mentioned, even those gentlemen in the Department who were opposed to admitting this journal as second-class matter said, "If you received your subscriptions directly from the individuals composing your order, the paper would be entitled to the mails as second class matter." "Well, then," said I, "it makes a difference whether we as individuals instruct some one as our agent to make contracts for these subscriptions, or whether we go as individuals and subscribe ourselves." In the basement they said it did, and in the attic they said it did not. [Laughter.]

Now, if it was not a ruling, how did we get the change? And if these gentlemen will show you one ruling of that Department that has barred one of these journals, and will bring you in all of the rulings on the subject, I will show you three for every one that admits them. They are precisely the same. There is no difference in them. It is just merely a question of the construction of the law.

Now, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON] will doubtless bring in the decision of Judge Tyner on one of these cases, where it was held up before him by the Third Assistant as a reason why this paper I speak of should be ruled out of the mails, and Judge Tyner said: "We have got to consider every one of these as individual cases; we can not make any rules to govern all of them;" and when it came to ruling on this paper he simply made a memorandum with a lead pencil, saying "Admit this to the mails as second-class matter." That is all of the ruling in that Department.

I talked with Judge Thomas about it, and he said that under a strict construction of the law every one of them must be denied the mails; and the only reason why they were not put out was because there had been no objection made to them all. And when the gentleman from California undertakes to say that only two are now denied admission to the mails, he is in error, because I can show him that there are ten that are now denied access to the mails, and they have as much right to go through the mails as the hundred of those now going through. It is simply a question of whether we are going to construe the law ourselves or whether they are going to construe it for us. I believe the law should be construed liberally, as the amendment contemplates, and not left to the prejudice or caprice of some official who by accident or mistake may be in position to decide. The question of expense is not at issue; if second-class matter does not pay enough, that is another question; all we ask is that the Department be notified not to discriminate against this class of journals.

Mr. TERRY was recognized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be very much obliged to the gentleman from Arkansas if he will confine himself strictly to the point of order. The debate has taken a somewhat wide range.

Mr. TERRY. I propose to do so, Mr. Chairman. I shall address myself to the point of order and desire to confine my remarks to that point. I ask at this time to have a communication from the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, which I hold in my hand, read from the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT, April 4, 1894.

DEAR SIR: The case of the Journal of the Arkansas Medical Society was reopened at your request. After a careful examination and consideration of a new application for entry with explanations by the publisher, this office finds that the Journal is issued by the Arkansas Medical Society and furnished to its 238 members "whose annual dues are paid in the nature of subscriptions." It is therefore held to be primarily designed to furnish members with the proceedings of the society, and therefore under paragraph 4, section 277—as construed by paragraph 4, section 280, Postal Laws and Regulations—is not entitled to the second-class rates of postage.

I can see no good reason for modifying my previous action in the case, and therefore am obliged to deny the request for its admission to the mails at the second-class rates of postage.

Very respectfully,

KERR CRAIGE,
Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

Hon. W. L. TERRY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. TERRY. Now, sir, I desire briefly to call the attention of the committee and the Chair to the law upon this subject. Omitting the first, second, and third subdivisions of section 277, the whole controversy turns on the fourth subdivision, and when you come to the fourth subdivision it is made to turn on this language:

Having a legitimate list of subscribers.

And then the following:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit to the second-class matter regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes, or for free circulation, or for circulation at nominal rates.

Now, it is not contended here that this medical journal, referred to in the letter I have just had read—and I use it just by way of illustrating my position—is "designed primarily for advertising purposes." Nor is it contended that it is issued for "free circulation" or "for circulation at nominal rates." But the Third Assistant Postmaster-General bases his ruling on that. He says:

It is therefore held to be primarily designed to furnish members with the proceedings of the society.

Now, sir, there is not a syllable of law here that would authorize him to exclude from the mail a publication of this kind because it is "designed to furnish members with the proceedings of the society." Because the law itself says in the very beginning of the fourth subdivision:

It must be originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character or devoted to literature and science.

The publication referred to in this letter is devoted to the science of medicine, and therefore it is clearly within the purview of the fourth subdivision, unless it can be excluded on the ground that it is "designed to furnish members with the proceedings of the society."

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. TERRY. Certainly.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. If that be so, then why is any legislation necessary at all?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. It is simply changing a construction.

Mr. TERRY. Why, the real point in dispute is whether it is provided for under existing law. The gentleman from Ohio, I think, misapprehends the point. If we are not able to show that this is provided for under existing law, the point of order made by the gentleman from North Carolina would be well taken. So the effort is to show that it is authorized under the law, but was ruled out under a construction of the Department.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. If there is such law, can not those persons who claim to be injured by the ruling of the Department go into the courts and compel the Department to execute the law?

Mr. TERRY. Well, they might go into the court; and they can also come to the Congress of the United States! [Applause.]

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. They have chosen a more expeditious way.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The duty of Congress is to legislate. Then if they come to Congress, they come to secure legislation, or to secure a change of existing law, do they not?

Mr. TERRY. For a long time it has been the practice of Congress to give construction to legislative enactments, or pass declaratory laws.

Mr. HUDSON. Is it not true that the Department has made a great many different rulings upon this question?

Mr. TERRY. Yes.

Mr. HUDSON. And that they are inconsistent and uncertain?

Mr. TERRY. Yes. I will state that in submitting the case of the Arkansas Journal to the Post-Office Department, I also sent along other medical journals, which were admitted as second-class matter, and circulated through the mails.

Mr. EVERETT. Will my friend from Arkansas yield to me for one moment?

Mr. TERRY. Certainly.

Mr. EVERETT. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Arkansas yields to me for a moment. In answer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] I wish to say that this clause would be in the nature of a declaratory act, such as the Legislatures of this country and of the old country have recognized for years. When Mr. Fox's great law of libel was passed, which declared that juries in libel cases were judges of the law and of the fact, that was not new legislation, but was declaratory of what the law always had been, against the false decisions of all the courts for years; and this, in the same way, is not new legislation; it is an act declaratory of what is and has been the law, but has been misapprehended by the executive department.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY] finished what he has to say?

Mr. TERRY. Just one word more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hopes that the gentleman will not be further interrupted until he concludes his statement to the Chair, for the Chair desires to rule upon this question.

Mr. TERRY. It will be noted, in this communication that has just been read, that the honorable Third Assistant Postmaster-General says that the decision is based upon paragraph 4 of section 277, "as construed by paragraph 4 of section 280." I apprehend that is a mistake in the number of the section. It must mean section 281, because the fourth subdivision of section 280 relates to "market quotations, business cards," etc.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has the law before him.

Mr. TERRY. Now, turning to the fourth subdivision of section 281, which is the one manifestly intended, that provides that when a publication is controlled by a society, association, or club, and is distributed among its members upon the payment of regular dues or assessments covering the cost of publication, it shall not be subject to second-class rates.

Now, I undertake to say, without the fear of successful contradiction, that there is nothing in the fourth subdivision of section 277 that authorizes the ruling contained in subdivision 4 of section 281 there referred to.

Mr. LOUD. I will be very brief, Mr. Chairman. I desire to present to the Chairman one or two points in this case. I do not care to argue the merits of the question. I might by way of parenthesis say that probably there is not a man on the floor who has had more and closer relations with fraternal societies than I myself have had for a great number of years, and I also recognize the fact that our law probably needs some revision, but I recognize the fact also, beyond that, Mr. Chairman, that the revision of this law should be carefully digested by a committee.

Now, as to whether this changes existing law or not, I will ask the Chairman, if it does not change existing law, then why is there any necessity for the amendment at all?

It must be apparent to the Chair upon its face that it does change existing law, because it wipes out, in regard to the societies herein enumerated, one of the most important safeguards now in existence upon the statute books regulating the admission of newspapers at second-class rates. It prescribes that in this particular these publications of these organizations or societies herein enumerated shall have admission to the mails at second-class rates regardless of whether they have any subscription or not. That is the most important point in this question as to the change of existing law. Now, then, there has been an endeavor in the argument on the point of order possibly to create sympathy. A paper was presented here and it was claimed that it was denied the right of second class rates. I will stake my word as a member of this House that that is not correct.

I will state to the gentleman from New York a fact that he well knows, and if he does not he ought to know, that it is an offense against the laws of this land to place anything of that character at the head of a newspaper unless it be a fact—that it is admitted at second-class rates. I do not care particularly to dwell upon the merits of the case. As I said to the Chairman, I believe that this changes existing law. As I said before, if it does not there is no necessity for it. But there is one point beyond that on which the Chair incidentally ruled upon yesterday to which I desire to call his attention. I think one of the most important points in this case is that it is not germane. While I recognize that the Chair did incidentally hold on yesterday that it must not necessarily be germane to the paragraph but that it must be germane to the bill, if the Chair will look at the decisions he will find that they have been rendered both ways.

On page 254 of the Digest a ruling was made upon an amendment which was offered on an item in the sundry civil appropriation bill making appropriation for building a mint, directing the coinage of bullion on deposit in the Treasury, that that would come under the supervision of the Treasury Department, the coinage of the bullion, just as much as the erection of a United States mint. It was ruled that that was not germane. Now, we have a question proposing to appropriate a certain sum of money, $25,000,000, for carrying the United States mails upon railroads. This department of the Post-Office is under the supervision of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, and if this matter were germane at all to this question, it would properly come under the Third Assistant Postmaster-General. I believe that one of the prime objects of departmental law is to promote harmony in the working of the Department, and I desire particularly to call the attention of the Chair to this last point, that this amendment would make this paragraph meaningless and not in harmony with the paragraph, and that it is not germane to this subject.

Mr. RAY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York for three minutes. The Chair will be compelled to limit gentlemen, and will recognize the gentleman from New York.

Mr. RAY. It very frequently happens, Mr. Chairman, that when laws are placed upon the statute books you find in them words and phrases in the construction of which men differ; the meaning is a matter of controversy. That seems to be the case here. We have a law upon the statute book with certain words and phrases used therein, and men differ as to their proper construction. In such cases it has always been the practice to go to the courts or to the legislative body and ask and procure the enactment of a declaratory act; an act specifying the construction that shall be given by the courts or by the bodies charged with the duty of executing the law. Now, the only question that arises in this case is that a proposition is made to have, by way of amendment to this bill, a declaratory act passed by this House setting forth what construction shall be given to the present law, and is or is not this legislation changing existing law.

I insist that it is not legislation changing existing law, but simply legislation which is declaratory, which defines the meaning of words and phrases already in the law, designed and intended to make the meaning clear, so that there shall be no difficulties hereafter in giving construction to existing law. It seems to me that right there hinges this whole controversy; and if the Chair shall feel bound to hold that a declaratory act, specifying the construction that shall hereafter be given to these words and phrases is a change of existing law, then it must sustain this point of order, otherwise not. The ruling of the Post-Office Department may be considered for some purposes a part of the law, but not when the question comes up on a proposition to define the meaning of the statute itself as written in the statute book.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for one minute.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, just one word in regard to this point of order, and strictly confined to that. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT] stated his proposition not only very clearly, but it is exceedingly pat to this proposition. It would leave us, unless his idea is correct, in this anomalous position. We pass a law with a specific idea and intent, and when we come to appropriate money for carrying out the purpose of the law, we may be met by some ruling in a Department that nullifies our intent or idea in regard to the law, as is the case here, and it makes it so that the very appropriation of money we make goes to a different purpose and is used in a different way than we intended to have it go and that we desired to have it go unless we can put on record, in connection with the appropriation, a declaratory statement of what we meant and intended by the law and the appropriation. It seems to me there can be no question about it.

In other words, we are bound hand and foot either to pass some new law that may be again misinterpreted or misconstrued by the officials of the Department, or here in a declaratory way say how our appropriations shall go, or how our enactment is to be construed. Congress is the controlling power and ought to have and has the power to interpret its own laws, and can so do under the rules. It is in no wise new legislation or the changing of any existing law, but rather the correction of a misinterpretation of existing law to carry out original legislative intent and give right construction of law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from North Carolina if he desires to make any further suggestion.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The matter has been very fully argued. I will only say this, that if the amendment does not change existing law it is entirely unnecessary, and, furthermore, if it does not change existing law it can not accomplish what the gentlemen desire, because the fourth section of the law will still remain, providing that a paper to be entitled to this privilege must be "originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character, or devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry, and having a legitimate list of subscribers; provided, however, that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit to the second-class rate regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes, or for free circulation, or for circulation at nominal rates."

The very language of the existing law which gentlemen say they wish stricken out is left untouched by this amendment. Therefore, I say if the amendment does not change existing law it is incompetent to accomplish what they desire. But it seems to me, of course, that it does change existing law, and, at the same time, that it can not accomplish the object which the gentlemen are trying to accomplish. I do not wish to argue the merits of the question further, but I would like to have published in the RECORD two rulings by two Assistant Attorneys-General for the Post-Office Department, one by Mr. Tyner and the other by Mr. Thomas. I do not undertake to say whether these rulings are correct or not, but I think they ought to be published for the information of the House and the country. They are certainly very able opinions, and speak for themselves.

The rulings referred to are as follows:

POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., October 15, 1891.

SIR: I return herewith all the papers, including a copy of the publication entitled The Equitable League, published monthly by a company composed of the officers of the supreme court of the order of the Equitable League of America, submitted with your letter of the 25th ultimo.

Your inquiry is whether this publication is entitled to admission into the mails as second-class matter. It is admitted that subscriptions are not collected direct from those whose names appear on the subscription lists, but are levied as assessments on the membership. In the issue of September 1, 1891, which you furnish for my inspection, it is announced in an editorial that "the supreme court adopted this paper as a means of sending the assessments to the membership direct from the supreme office, and at the same time to provide a means of furnishing information directly to each member of the order, independent of the local court officers."

It, therefore, seems to be treated by the organization as a circular used in the enforcement and collection of assessments, and for the notification to the members of the amounts or conditions of the assessments. One of the essentials of a legitimate periodical is a bona ide list of subscribers, representing persons who voluntarily and willingly subscribe, including those who accept the publication as the gift of others. Collecting the subscription in the nature of an assessment is a compulsory collection, and can not be considered as constituting "a legitimate list of subscribers" within the meaning of the law.

The pound rate should be denied to "The Equitable League."

Very respectfully,

JAS. N. TYNER,
Assistant Attorney-General.

Hon. A. D. HAZEN,
Third Assistant Postmaster-General.

OFFICE OF THE ASSISTANT ATTORNEY-GENERAL FOR THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
August 16, 1893.

SIR: The opinion rendered by Judge Tyner on the 15th day of October, 1891, in which I fully concur, covers the question presented by you verbally to me on the 15th instant, in regard to the mailability of the Good Fellow as second-class matter.

It appearing that the Good-Fellow's subscription list consists of 500 or 600 outside of lodge subscriptions and about 10,000 paid for by the lodge, without cost to the members beyond regular dues, it has not a "legitimate list of subscribers" within the meaning of section 277, Postal Laws and Regulations. If, as Judge Tyner held in the opinion referred to, the collection of subscriptions in the nature of an assessment from members of a fraternal society does not constitute a "legitimate list of subscribers," a fortiori does it not constitute such a list when it is made by the lodge without any assessment whatever for that purpose, and payment for which is made out of funds arising from the regular dues?

I will add that if it appears to you that this paper was not originated and is not published for the dissemination of information of a public character, or devoted to literature, the sciences, or arts, or some special industry, then it can not be admitted to the mails as second-class matter though it have a legitimate list of subscribers. I presume it will not be contended that this paper is devoted to literature, the sciences, or arts, or to a special industry, and, if it comes within the purview of the statute at all, it must be because it was originated and is published for the dissemination of information of a public character. Information of a public character, as here used, I take it, means information that would be of interest to the public generally. Information for the members of a secret society would not, in my opinion, be information of a public character within the meaning of the law. And even though a paper may contain some information of a public character, yet if it was not originated and is not published for the purpose of disseminating such information, but for another purpose, then it is not admissible to the mails as second-class matter.

To be more explicit: If the paper was originated and is published for the purpose of disseminating information of a public character, and the information it contains, which is intended exclusively for the members of the Royal Society of Good Fellows, is thrown in as an incident only, and it has a legitimate list of subscribers, then it is mailable as second-class matter; but, on the other hand, if it was originated and is published primarily for the purpose of giving information to the members of such society, and the poetic and literary gems contained in it are thrown in as sidelights only, then it is not mailable as second-class matter, though it have a legitimate list of subscribers.

I herewith hand you a copy of the opinion of Judge Tyner, referred to above.

Respectfully submitted.

JOHN L. THOMAS,
Assistant Attorney-General.

The POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has given to the point of order raised by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON] to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] the most careful consideration. The Chair has listened with a great deal of interest to every statement that has been made upon the floor by gentlemen who have addressed themselves to the point of order. In the mind of the Chair there is but a single question to be determined in passing upon this point of order, and that is as to whether the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois does in fact and in effect change an existing law, or whether it simply declares what the existing law is; in other words, whether it makes a change of existing law or merely a change of the interpretation and construction of that law by the Post-Office Department.

The Postmaster-General, as the executive officer of that Department, having the responsibility of the execution of all laws relating to the Department has, in the judgment of the Chair, the same right of interpretation and construction of an existing statute that a court of competent jurisdiction has in passing upon a law, and that construction or interpretation becomes a part of the law until the law is repealed, modified, changed, or declared to be otherwise, by the one power that has the right to overrule a construction or interpretation made by an Executive Department, the Congress of the United States. The House having jurisdiction of this appropriation bill, and this amendment being, in the judgment of the Chair, germane to the bill, it seeks, in the opinion of the Chair, to declare what the existing statute is. It is simply declaratory in its terms, and it differs, of course, from the construction and interpretation placed upon the statute by the Postmaster-General. Holding this view, the Chair overrules the point of order, and will submit the amendment upon its merits to the committee. The Clerk will report the modified amendment. [Applause.]

The modified amendment as printed above was again read.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to oppose this amendment, but I ask to have read for information of the House a statement which has come to me in the form of a petition, and which I now send to the desk.

The statement was read, as follows:

During the fiscal year ended June 30, 1893, there was carried in the mails 255,634,213 pounds of second-class mail matter, on which postage was paid at the rate of 1 cent per pound. Many experts estimate the cost of handling and transporting this character of mail at 10 cents per pound, while none place it at less than 8. If that is true, then the loss sustained by the Post-Office Department amounted to $17,894,401.91, a sum of money that is sufficiently large to cause a halt in its further expenditure.

Second-class matter embraces newspapers, magazines, trade papers, story papers, novelettes, advertising sheets, and an endless tonnage of literary rubbish sailing under the name of art, historical, and educational "Portfolios."

The bulk of second-class matter emanates from the large cities. New York furnished last year 60,914,149 pounds; Chicago, 34,077,601; Boston, 16,136,840; Philadelphia, 13,009,418, and St. Louis 12,515,182. The gain in New York over 1892 was over 17 per cent; in Chicago, 21; St. Louis, 23; Boston, 13, and Philadelphia, 7. The new publications started last year and entered as second-class matter reached the enormous number of 5,492.

Putting these facts together, it is plain to be seen that unless something is done to remedy the evil the efficiency of the service will be greatly crippled if not permanently injured.

It is a cardinal Democratic principle to sustain no enterprise, however worthy, at the expense of the National Treasury, and yet you go on, year after year, donating untold millions of dollars to the publishing interests of the United States by carrying its product in the mails at a rate of postage so low that it can not be regarded other than as an out and out gift. We are aware that it is being done in the name of "education," "progress," the "spread of intelligence," and all that sort of humbuggery, but it is time that the farce should cease and the printing industry stand upon its own merits, the same as all others where capital is invested and labor employed.

Why, in the name of common sense, do not you make a slash at the privileges accorded second-class mail matter and cut off a useless expenditure now rapidly approaching $20,000,000 a year? From the fact that the rate on this rubbish is but 1 cent a pound while it is eight on school books, no further argument is needed to show the falsity of the claim that it is done to promote "education" among the masses.

Almost all the daily papers in the larger cities have gone into the business of selling paper-covered novels, World's Fair, and an endless variety of other "Portfolios." Printing presses in New York, Chicago, and St. Louis are running night and day to fill the orders for these publications, all of which have been granted the privilege of second-class matter, and at the present rate of progress the tonnage of this stuff will exceed 200,000,000 pounds before June 30, 1894, and plunge the Department so deep into the mire of deficiency, that it will stagger Congress to raise the funds to liquidate it.

We do not want the privileges accorded country weekly papers to be interfered with, as they are a positive and distinct benefit to the communities where published, but we do hope that Congress will have sufficient courage to pass a bill to raise the rate on all other second-class matter to 8 cents per pound.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. EVERETT], who desires to offer an amendment to the amendment, and I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this proposition close in ten minutes from this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there are several gentlemen who have notified the Chair that they would like to occupy a few minutes, as they did not have an opportunity to be heard upon the point of order, and therefore the Chair suggests to the gentleman that less than thirty minutes for debate will be insufficient to accommodate them.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I ask unanimous consent that debate on this proposition close in thirty minutes, unless otherwise ordered by the committee.

Mr. REED. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. Well, I will move to close debate after the five-minute debate has progressed under the rule.

Mr. REED. I think the debate will most naturally close when members have gotten through with it.

Mr. SPRINGER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. EVERETT. Mr. Chairman, I merely wish to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois by inserting, after the word "professional," the words "literary, historical;" so that it shall read, "professional, literary, historical, or scientific."

The Clerk read the amendment of Mr. EVERETT.

Mr. SPRINGER. So far as is in my power, I accept that amendment. I hope it will be agreed to.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. EVERETT, it was agreed to.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I desire to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] by adding a few words.

The amendment of Mr. WASHINGTON was read, as follows:

After the words "scientific societies" add the following: "Including the bulletins issued by the State boards of health."

Mr. WASHINGTON. There are not, of course, more than forty State boards of health in the United States. To-day the bulletins issued by these important organizations have (with the exception of perhaps about three) been denied by the ruling of the Post-Office Department admission to the mails as second-class matter. This amendment will not very greatly increase the expenditure of the Department; and I think it is in accordance with humanity and justice and a proper interpretation of the law.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. WASHINGTON was agreed to.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I can see that it is useless to attempt to oppose an amendment of this character in this House. "The sacred right of petition" has evidently done its work. [Laughter.] But I desire to point out the danger of adopting in this manner a measure of this character. I call attention to the fact that the bill on this subject as originally introduced in this House has been withdrawn and reintroduced twice. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], evidently afraid that he might "get left" on this proposition—evidently afraid that the committee might report a bill on the subject, or that the honorable Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] or the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HAINER] might possibly get the credit of this proposition—comes in and offers upon an appropriation bill an amendment dangerous in form and character.

This country is now being taxed to the extent of more than $16,000,000 a year for the transmission of periodicals and journals through the mails. Now you not only propose to open the mails further, to the extent suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, but two amendments widening still further his proposition have already been adopted; and I can see there will be no end to amendments. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WASHINGTON] has proposed to admit documents issued by State boards of health. That would necessarily admit the reports of such boards, which may assume the magnitude of millions of pounds. [A laugh and cries of "Oh, no!"] Well, you may laugh, but I venture the prophecy here—time will demonstrate whether I am wrong or not—that if you adopt this amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, with such amendments as may be put upon it, you will increase the expenditures of the Post-Office Department at least $10,000,000 within the next two years.

The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads have had this matter under consideration and are now investigating it. In due time they will present to the House a well-digested measure. I believe that to be the proper method of proceeding, if we wish well-considered legislation on this subject. I do not believe it proper to adopt a measure of so much importance, when many members do not understand its full purport and effect. I believe if members of the House could have the opportunity of soberly considering this matter, they might perhaps take a different view of it. I am not opposed to a revision of the law on this subject, but I believe it should be made with care; that any measure we may adopt should be digested in a committee and duly considered by the House upon a deliberate report.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the objection raised by the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] is easily answered. We propose simply to declare what the law is. The gentleman's committee can go ahead and bring in a bill revising the whole law on this subject. There is nothing to prevent his committee from reporting any measure which it may deem necessary.

But I do insist that this law while it stands ought to be so construed that no higher privileges or greater rights shall be given to such a paper as the Police Gazette than to papers which are educational in their purpose and beneficent in their influence. We desire by this amendment to change the construction which has recently been placed upon the law, so that these newspapers and periodicals may enjoy the privileges which it was designed to give them. The committee to which the gentleman belongs can, as I have said, take up this subject later and deal with it as a whole.

Mr. LOUD. This act would evidently take effect subsequently to any bill we might bring in.

Mr. BRYAN. That need not be so.

Mr. LOUD. It naturally would be.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman intimates that the cost of carrying these papers through the mails is more than the amount which the Government receives for carrying them, and possibly objects to the amendment on that ground.

Mr. LOUD. I do not intimate it; I know it. It costs 7½ cents a pound more than they get for it.

Mr. BRYAN. Then, if that is true, the committee of which the gentleman is a member ought at once to report a measure that will correct the wrong, a bill which will deal with the whole subject comprehensively, and not attempt to discriminate against papers like the Modern Woodman organ and similar ones, which are, under the ruling of the office, prohibited from enjoying the rights that are accorded to less meritorious publications. It seems only fair and just that the House should act promptly upon this proposition.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I venture to make another suggestion to the Committee of the Whole in addition to those which have already been submitted. If it be true, as the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] has stated, that this is one of the last bills to be passed by the House, it affords simply another reason for the adoption of the amendment; for evidently if this is one of the last bills, we can not hope to get anything from the committee of which he is a member.

Further than that, I desire to say that no member need hesitate a moment to vote in favor of this amendment by reason of the fact that it was proposed formally by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], as all of the friends of this measure have acted heartily in co operation in the effort to incorporate this amendment in the bill. It is not a question of "glory" for any member. It is a question of justice to a very deserving class of papers and millions of deserving people—the very best in the land.

Mr. PICKLER. Let me ask the gentleman whether the language of the amendment covers the provisions of the Manderson-Hainer bill?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The amendment does fully and thoroughly cover the substance of that bill; in fact, the language is that of the bill.

Mr. PICKLER. Then this is practically the Hainer bill?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. It is in the exact language of the bill, and in addition embodies an amendment which I proposed to the gentleman from Illinois on yesterday, and two minor amendments just adopted by the committee.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. If the gentleman will permit an interruption, I may have misunderstood what he said, but I thought he stated that nothing could be hoped for from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. No; I did not say that.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I hope the gentleman from Nebraska will explain that statement then, because the committee, I am satisfied, are favorable to reporting a bill covering this ground, and I do not wish the committee to be placed in a wrong position.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I have no desire to place it in any attitude of that kind. I suggested merely that if the information of the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] was correct as to this being one of the last bills to be passed by the House, it was useless to hope for anything from the Post-Office Committee.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I merely wanted to place the committee, and myself particularly, in the right, because the people whom I have the honor to represent are disposed to be very favorable to some such action as is contemplated on this proposition; and a majority of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads favor the measure.

Mr. LOUD. Will the gentleman from Nebraska please explain what he means in reference to a statement of mine, to which he has referred?

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I referred to what the gentleman had said about this being one of the last bills.

Mr. LOUD. I said this would be the last bill, and of course I referred generally to appropriation bills. We all know that appropriation bills coming from the Senate are usually the last things acted upon by Congress.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. The gentleman gave us to understand that there would be no further legislation.

Mr. LOUD. Not at all.

Mr. HAINER of Nebraska. I am perfectly willing to accept the gentleman's disclaimer.

Mr. CARUTH. Mr. Chairman, I do not think that there ought to be any hesitation upon the part of the committee in passing the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois. It is well enough for the gentleman from North Carolina to say that it is the purpose of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to report to this House a well-matured measure covering the objects proposed to be covered by this amendment. But we all know the difficulty in getting consideration for independent bills of such a character.

Now, this proposition is one which has attracted a great deal of attention throughout the length and breadth of the land, and the petition box of this Congress has been filled by requests from all sections of the country for the passage of a measure like that now proposed. I have always thought that a fair construction of the law would entitle these papers to pass at the same rates through the mails as papers devoted to any other interest.

I have long been identified with fraternal organizations in this country, and take a great deal of interest in the prosperity of such orders, because I know the facts, and because I know the vast amount of good accomplished by them. I know the suffering that they have relieved, the want they have alleviated; I know the blessings they have brought to the widows and orphans of this land; and knowing that, I think it desirable to spread these institutions amongst the poorer classes of the country so as to enable the heads of families everywhere to provide, through these organizations, an insurance fund for their benefit, or for their wives and children when the hand that supported them is palsied in death, and the husband and father can no longer labor for their support. Anything of that sort ought to receive the encouragement of this House and of the country.

I am glad that the gentleman from Illinois has introduced this amendment. This is not a question as to who is to derive the glory or renown from the amendment, whether it is to be ascribed to the gentleman from Illinois or to the gentleman from Nebraska, or to the Senator from Nebraska. The question is to effect this desired and needed legislation—not to effect it, but to declare the intent of legislation already upon the statute books. I hope this amendment will pass this House by an overwhelming vote. [Applause.]

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I must say that I have been somewhat surprised, not only now, but for years past, at the ruling of the Postmaster-General on this question. I know that such papers as the African Colonization Journal, the Christian Intelligencer, the Christian Inquirer, the Methodist, and all other religious and denominational papers have been carried for years at second-class rates, without any protest on the part of the Post-Office Department. I will also mention the Army and Navy Journal, the Army and Navy Register, and other papers of that kind, to which no objection has been raised.

For fifty years, Mr. Chairman religious newspapers have established club rates for the circulation of their journals. These club rates have been paid by the members of the churches in the various towns and cities of the United States. These members have received the papers at lower rates than the advertised price, and nobody has made any objection. Now, when a trades union publishes a newspaper, and the different trades unions throughout the country take copies of that newspaper, the same as those clubs take the church papers, sending the subscription to the publisher, I can not see why they should be ruled out, while these religious papers are admitted. All I ask for is equality before the law in this matter, that the workingmen shall have the same rights in the use of the mails that the religious organizations have; that the workingman shall have the same right that an association of capitalists would have in receiving the Financial Chronicle, or any of the other newspapers published in Wall street.

I must compliment the chairman upon the ruling which he has made here, for it is evidently clear from the law itself that the Post-Office Department had made a wrong interpretation of it; and it is to the credit of this Committee of the Whole that it has a chairman who has the integrity to make a right ruling, and virtually to reverse the interpretation of the Post-Office Department.

Sir, I believe that the House of Representatives will almost unanimously pass this amendment, because I know that it is right, and that the House itself feels satisfied that it is righting a wrong when it votes affirmatively upon this question. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentlemen from Illinois as amended by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inland transportation by railroad routes, of which a sum not exceeding $30,000 may be employed to pay freight on postal cards, stamped envelopes, and stamped paper, and other supplies from the manufactories to the post-offices and depots of distribution, $25,509,000.

Mr LOUD. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 15 and 16 strike out the words "twenty-five million five hundred thousand dollars" and insert the words "twenty-six million nine hundred thousand dollars."

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I have simply offered an amendment providing for the amount covered by the recommendations of the Post-Office Department. I do not think the chairman of the committee, or any member of the committee, will attempt to hold that this amount of money will not be required during the next fiscal year to pay for the transportation of mails over railroads.

Of course I understand the object of the committee in cutting off $1,400,000. It is simply to make the aggregate amount of the appropriations at the end of this session so much less. But by referring to the report of the chairman of the committee you will find that there has been a steady and constant deficiency in this item, by reason principally of the cutting off of so large an amount: but the committee this year have cut off a larger amount than was ever attempted before. The reductions heretofore have been from $500,000 to $750,000. I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that there will in a few days be a deficiency bill here calling for $1,200,000 to cover a deficiency for transportation on the last appropriation bill. I simply desire to say that it is honest, fair, and decent: that it is simply providing the amount of money that will necessarily be used during the coming fiscal year.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the amendment ought to prevail, and I will say to the committee that the items of an appropriation bill either create a deficiency every year or they create a surplus. Heretofore—that is, previous to 1893—there has always been a very large surplus every year of unexpended balances of different items.

Mr. LOUD. Not on this item.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. On different items in the appropriation bill.

Mr. LOUD. Not on this item?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. No; not on this item. Now, what the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads has proposed to do is to try and arrange it so that when we make appropriations all around for the Post-Office Department, the deficiencies shall about equalize the unexpended balances of the appropriation.

In my opinion, the money that will be required for railroad transportation during the next fiscal year, proposed by this bill, is amply sufficient. It is true that there may be a deficiency, but the deficiency for 1893 has not yet come in. I do not believe that there will be a very great deficiency next year. I think we have recommended very nearly the amount that will be required. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For railway post-office clerks, $7,186,000, of which sum not to exceed $15,000 may be used to pay necessary traveling expenses of chief clerks and railway postal clerks traveling on duty under order of the Postmaster-General.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, it has been agreed that the next paragraph shall be passed over until the bill is concluded.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. This is the paragraph preceding that of which the chairman of the committee spoke.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 4, line 22, after the word "Postmaster-General," add the following: "When any railway postal clerk who shall, without his fault, be injured by accident in the line of his duty as such clerk so as to render him unable to continue work for a limited time, such clerk shall be entitled to a leave of absence for a period not to exceed two years from the date of such injury, with the same pay as though actually engaged in his work. Such leave with pay to be granted by and under the direction of the General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service, under such reasonable regulations as may be necessary to carry into effect the intent of this provision."

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I reserve the point of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman makes the point of order. The gentleman will please state his point of order.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. That it changes existing law and does not reduce expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois upon the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question, if he will give me his attention.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina will please give his attention.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I understand the point of order raised against this amendment is that it changes existing law.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. And does not reduce expenditures.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Well, I understand your objection is that it changes existing law and does not reduce expenditures.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. That is right.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Will you tell me what the law is in reference to this particular point, so that I may answer your point intelligently.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I did not exactly understand the reading of the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I would like to have it read again, because I think the chairman will not insist on his point of order when he understands the amendment.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I will insist on the point of order: but I would like to hear the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I think the chairman will not object to that.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I must insist upon the point of order. It certainly changes existing law.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Then, Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a statement of my reasons for offering this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois on the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I understand that under the existing rulings in the Post-Office Department when a railway mail clerk has been injured by accident on a railroad, and it is not the fault of the clerk at all, so that he is unable to perform his duties, the Post-Office Department allows him a leave of absence, not for any specific time, but a leave of absence with pay not exceeding one year, although, as I understand, there is no specific law on that subject; but that is the ruling of the Department. So much with reference to that.

Then I desire to say that my object in offering this amendment is this. We have in the Railway Mail Service 6,645 railway postal clerks. They have received the attention of the Post-Office Department, and there is in the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General a recommendation made for legislation in the interest of those who are killed.

During the last fiscal year there were four hundred and three wrecks in which postal clerks were involved as shown by the reports of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General. In those wrecks ten of the postal clerks were actually killed; sixty-six were seriously injured, and one hundred and fifteen were slightly injured. The report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General suggests and urges this House to pass some legislation during this session for the relief of those clerks. I desire to say to the chairman of the committee on Post-Office and Post-Roads, of which I am a member, that this amendment is not offered for buncombe, but is in my judgment in the interest of a deserving class of our people. Its benefits would reach every Congressional district in the United States, and would reach a class of men, of young men, who are the flower of the people.

I know, as is stated in the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, that this class of Government employés is engaged in probably the most hazardous work of any other class of Government employés. The postal car is next to the tender on the railroad train. These employés are kept from their homes. They have not an opportunity to look out for danger. They are attending to the business of 67,000,000 people of the United States, facilitating the transportation of our mails, and their correct distribution.

There is, in my judgment, no class of Government employés who are entitled to more consideration than are the railway-mail postal clerks in the service of the United States. When an accident occurs, when a train has been run into by another train and a postal clerk has been injured, he is often laid up and unable to perform his duties for a long period, and in such cases he is granted by the Post-Office Department pay for a limited time——

Mr. TAWNEY. What is that period?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Under a postal regulation it is not to exceed one year. The purpose of the amendment which I offer is to provide that in case of accident without the fault or negligence of the postal clerk himself, where the accident results in disabling him for the performance of his duties, he may be given—not that he shall be, but that he may be given—leave of absence for a term not to exceed two years, and the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service is to grant him such leave in his discretion and in view of all the circumstances of the case.

Suppose a clerk is so injured that he is unable to continue his duties in three months, or four months, or six months, or a year, this amendment provides that his salary shall be paid to him just as though he were able to do his work, for whatever period his disability may last, not to exceed two years: but if at the end of that period he is unable to resume work, then of course he may be dropped from the rolls and receive no further compensation. I present this amendment to the House and ask, in justice to this worthy class of employés, that Congress will concede to them what I consider an honest and fair allowance in cases where they are disabled from accidents without any neglect or fault on their own part. I hope the amendment will prevail. In conclusion I repeat that this amendment does not compel the Department to pay any clerk who is injured for a period of two years, but simply to pay him for such time as, under the rules and regulations and in view of the circumstances of the case, the Postmaster-General may think proper, and it does seem to me that any gentleman on this floor will not object to these clerks, under such circumstances, receiving compensation while they are unable to perform their duties or to engage in any other business.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Why no include all Government employés and pension them all?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire to add a word on the point of order. I indorse fully everything that has been uttered by my colleague [Mr. SMITH of Illinois] respecting the merits of the pending amendment and the character of the employés whom it seeks to serve, and it seems to me that the point of order as taken by the chairman of the committee [Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina] is not well founded, for this reason: Under existing law, as the Postmaster-General has construed it, he has a right to pension employés of this class who are injured under the conditions mentioned in the amendment for various lengths of time: in some instances the period has been only four months, in others six months, and in still others twelve months. Under the interpretation put upon the law by the Post-Office Department there is no limitation of the period.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman please read the existing law on this subject so that the Chair may know what it is?

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I have not the law before me. There is no controversy among members upon the floor as to the right of the Department under existing law to pension employés who are injured under the circumstances mentioned in the amendment. The amendment limits the time during which this benefit can be conferred upon such employés by providing that it shall not exceed a period of two years. Now, as I have already said, under existing law there is no limitation, and it seems to me that the limitation contained in the amendment brings it clearly within the requirement of the rule. I trust, therefore, the Chair will hold that the point of order is not well taken. I have used the word "pension" because it was used by my colleague: what I mean by it is the continuation of the pay which the employé was receiving at the time he was injured.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON] state whether there is any existing law upon this subject?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I know of no existing law upon this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no existing law, the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois is new legislation.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. But the point of order which the gentleman made was that the amendment changed existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. New legislation would come within the prohibition of the rule. The Chair would like to know the fact as to the existing law before he passes upon the point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I will state to the Chair that I have made inquiry in reference to that matter, and have been informed that there is no actual law on this subject, but that the Post Office Department does give leaves of absence with pay for periods not exceeding one year. That is simply granted by the Department without any law directly authorizing it. In those cases, leave of absence with pay is granted by the Post-Office Department without any specific law authorizing it. Here is the regulation, as contained in the report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will please read it.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois (reading):

Clerks so seriously injured in accidents while on duty as to prevent them from making their regular runs are granted leaves of absence with pay in periods of thirty days each for one year, unless able to resume duties sooner. If unable to resume duty at the expiration of one year from the date the injuries were received, they are retired from the service. During the time they are off duty the Department provides for their runs by employing acting clerks at its own expense.

That is the Post-Office regulation; there is no statute on the subject.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. I suggest further to the Chair that such a regulation as has just been read could not be adopted by the Department unless in accordance with existing law; and if there is such a regulation fixing the time within which an injured employé of the Department may draw salary, the amendment now proposed is a limitation upon the power of the Department.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is any law on the subject the amendment is clearly subject to the point of order, because it changes the existing law. As the Chair sees this proposition, this matter, under the general law, is within the discretion of the Postmaster-General; and if he can legally adopt a rule giving to these clerks twelve months' leave of absence, he can give them leave for five years. If he has any discretion at all, there is no limit to his discretion, unless the gentleman who presents the amendment can show that there is some limit fixed by existing law.

Mr. MARSH. The point is that this is a limitation upon that discretion of the Postmaster-General.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it changes any law on the subject that may exist.

Mr. MARSH. But as a limitation upon the power of the Postmaster-General it is in the line of economy. If he now can grant leave of absence with pay for five years, this cuts down the exercise of his discretion to a period of two years. Hence it is a limitation, and in the line of economy.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. In other words, it retrenches expenditures, and in that way comes clearly within the provision of the rule under which any amendment changing existing law is admissible if it retrenches expenditures.

The CHAIRMAN. Neither the report submitted to the Chair, nor any statement made by either of the gentlemen from Illinois has shown that the leave granted by the Department has ever been extended beyond two years.

Mr. HOPKINS of Illinois. The point I made was based upon the statement of my colleague [Mr. SMITH] that the law now permits the Department to allow the salary to go right on month after month while the employé is not actually rendering service to the Government, having been injured under the conditions suggested in the amendment. As the Chair has very properly suggested, under the present law allowing the Postmaster-General a discretion, he has the same authority to grant leave with pay for five years as for twelve months. But this amendment is a limitation upon that discretion, and operates as a retrenchment of expenditures, because it denies to the Postmaster-General the authority of extending such leave beyond the period of two years.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. One of the objects of the amendment is to fix a time beyond which the Post-Office Department shall not go in granting these leaves. It is a limitation upon the existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. Upon the last statement of the gentleman from Illinois, the Chair thinks that whatever discretion the Postmaster-General now has in adopting a rule or regulation to carry into effect this most beneficent provision, the amendment would so change the law that if an extreme case should arise, when in the judgment of the Postmaster-General or the Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service a railway mail clerk, badly crippled while faithfully discharging his duties, ought to receive leave with pay for three years or five years, this amendment would deprive the Postmaster-General absolutely of the right of extending this beneficence to such postal clerk. The Chair sustains the point of order and rules the amendment out.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I feel constrained, with all due respect, to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, because the action of the Department shows that it will not extend the provision in these cases beyond one year.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the opinion of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question being taken; there were on a division (called for by Mr. SMITH of Illinois)—ayes 101, noes 6.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered, only 5 members voting in favor thereof.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. It is too late to make the point that no quorum voted upon the appeal; and upon ordering tellers no quorum is necessary.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. I simply felt it my duty to raise the point. If the Chair overruled it, of course I cheerfully submit.

The CHAIRMAN. On the question of sustaining the opinion of the Chair the ayes have it, and the opinion of the Chair stands as the judgment of the committee.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the next paragraph is the one that was excepted until the bill is completed, and the Clerk will begin reading with line 6 on page 5.

Mr. KYLE. I desire now to offer the amendment that I submitted the other day.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, this matter is not under consideration until after the remainder of the bill has been passed upon. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL.

For manufacture of adhesive postage and special-delivery stamps, $243,000.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I desire to offer an amendment to this part of the bill, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the paragraph on page 5, line 20, by striking out the words "two hundred and forty-three" and insert "one hundred and sixty-three;" so that the paragraph in lines 19 and 20 shall read:

"For manufacture of adhesive postage and special-delivery stamps, $163,000."

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I desire to have read a letter from the Postmaster-General, which gives the reason for the change.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., March 24, 1894.

SIR: The estimate submitted by this Department for the cost of manufacture of adhesive postage and special-delivery stamps for the fiscal year beginning July 1, next, was based upon the prices paid under the existing contract.

Under the favorable proposal of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, which has been accepted, to furnish postage stamps for the ensuing fiscal year, the cost to the Department for the manufacture of the stamps is so largely reduced that I desire to submit a revised estimate as follows:

For the manufacture of adhesive and special-delivery stamps..	$163,000.00

This estimate is $80,000 less than the estimate heretofore submitted through the Secretary of the Treasury.

The calculations showing the cost of furnishing the stamps under the arrangement with the Bureau of Engraving and Printing are as follows:

3,207,941,859 ordinary stamps, at 5 cents a thousand	$160,397.03
4,115,140 special delivery stamps, at 11.4 cents a thousand	469.03
4,885,160 newspaper and periodical stamps, at 11.4 cents a thousand	554.63
21,114,125 postage-due stamps, at 6.05 cents a thousand	1,277.40
Total cost	162,698.15
Or, in round numbers	163,000.00
Former estimate	243,000.00
Reduction	80,000.00

Very respectfully,

W. S. BISSELL, Postmaster-General.

Hon. JOHN S. HENDERSON,
Chairman Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads,
House of Representatives.

Mr. REED. What is this: a reduction on the amount of the appropriation?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Yes; on the amount proposed to be appropriated.

Mr. DINGLEY. This reduction is based on the assumption that the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is to do the work of preparing these stamps?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I imagine so.

Mr. DINGLEY. Why, it is so stated in the letter that you have just had read.

Mr. DUNPHY. If the gentleman from Maine will wait a moment, my amendment goes to that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNPHY] will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend page 5, line 20, by striking out the words "two hundred and forty-three thousand dollars," and in place thereof insert the words "one hundred and sixty-three thousand dollars;" and no part of these stamps shall be manufactured, engraved, or printed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I make the point of order on that amendment. And I ask that the substitute be divided. The proposition is divisible.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. On what ground?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The point of order is that the amendment changes existing law, and does not reduce expenditures.

Mr. O'NEIL of Massachusetts. Not at all.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. It is a limitation on the expenditure of the money.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNPHY] has offered the amendment as a substitute to that of the gentleman from North Carolina?

Mr. DUNPHY. No; as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I suggest that if the gentleman offers it as an amendment he ought to strike out the first part.

Mr. DUNPHY. This adopts the figures as they appear in the printed bill and in the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. It seems to be a substitute.

Mr. DUNPHY. Very well, I have no objection. Let it be considered as an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The amendment that I propose will reduce the amount of the appropriation to $163,000. The gentleman from New York proposes——

Mr. DUNPHY. To reduce it to the same amount.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Yes; so that his amendment, or that part of it, is surplusage, and I do not see how it can be an amendment to mine.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York now states to the Chair that he offers it as an amendment in the nature of a substitute. And to that substitute the Chair understands the gentleman from North Carolina makes the point of order.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Now, will the gentleman please state the point of order.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. It is that the second clause of the amendment is new legislation. It is bound to change existing law because the proposition is that the Postmaster-General shall be deprived of the power that he now possesses, or a discretion that he has, under existing law. You want to take it away from him; and the only way you can do it is by changing the law; so that this amendment, if it seeks to accomplish that, is subject to a point of order.

Mr. HAYES. Does the gentleman from North Carolina claim that the law would now permit the Postmaster-General to have this work done at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing?

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. Certainly.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. There is no question about that.

Mr. HAYES. I think there is a question. But I wanted to get the position of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. DUNPHY. The reason the amendment is offered, Mr. Chairman, just at this time and to this section, is in order to put into this bill the declaration of just what the law on the subject is.

There is no intention whatsoever of changing the existing law. I have gone through all the sections of the statute conferring authority on the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and I do not find a single paragraph or sentence in any paragraph that permits the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to print these stamps. It is a well-known fact, however, that notwithstanding there is no authority of law authorizing it to be done, the Postmaster-General and the Secretary of the Treasury have concluded and determined to authorize the Bureau of Printing and Engraving to do this work.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. They did that upon the opinion of the Solicitor-General.

Mr. DUNPHY. I will get at that in a moment, if my colleague will allow me. I have no objection at all to allowing the Department to execute the laws in full. The objection that I have is in permitting the heads of Departments and chiefs of bureaus to make laws; and that is just what they seem to have done in this case.

It is true that the Solicitor of the Treasury has rendered an opinion in which he decides that there is authority for the Bureau of Printing and Engraving to do this work. He has arrived at his decision in this patchwork sort of way: He takes the section of the statute numbered 3577, which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to have the notes engraved and printed, and he supplements that by the appropriation acts which appropriate money for work and materials for the Bureau. Then he takes another section—section 5413—and he finds there the definition of what are the obligations and securities of the Government, and he finds that stamps are included in those. Therefore he says that the Bureau of Printing and Engraving has the authority to print the stamps.

Now, Mr. Chairman, and I wish to call the attention of the Chair particularly to this, the answer to the Solicitor of the Treasury is to be found in this fact, that heretofore, whenever it was attempted to do this thing, the matter was submitted to Congress and the authority of Congress was asked.

Mr. REED. It has been repeatedly asked, has it not?

Mr. DUNPHY. It has been asked repeatedly. It has been asked of four Congresses. Four Congresses have had the matter up, and have discussed it, and after discussion have refused to allow it to be done. Notwithstanding that, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding that the Solicitor of the Treasury may be a gentleman learned in the law, I think that the present Secretary of the Treasury, when he puts his mind upon a law question, is just as safe a person to follow, just as safe a judge to follow, as the Solicitor of the Treasury.

Mr. REED. The present Secretary has asked the authority of Congress to do it, has he not, which he would not have done if he thought he had the authority already?

Mr. DUNPHY. Exactly. And now I want to read what the present Secretary in his report to Congress says on this point.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At present this Bureau executes all of the work of engraving and printing required by the Treasury Department, and much of that required by the other Departments of the Government. The most considerable work of this kind now executed outside of the Bureau is the postage stamps and postal notes required by the Post-Office Department. It might be well for Congress to consider the advisability of having this portion of the work of the Government also executed by this Bureau.

Mr. DUNPHY. Mr. Chairman, there is the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to this Congress, in which he says it would be well for this Congress to consider this question, and yet the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General, without any consideration of this question by Congress, and without any authority from Congress, have determined to have this work done in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. The reason I put the amendment in is, that they may be made to understand just what the law is on the subject, and that Congress will not permit such things to be done without special authority given by it.

Mr. SAYERS. May I ask the gentleman a question before he sits down?

Mr. DUNPHY. Yes, of course.

Mr. SAYERS. I should like to have the gentleman from New York point out to the committee the law which requires the Postmaster-General to contract with private parties for the printing of these stamps. Is there any law upon the subject?

Mr. DUNPHY. I will tell you what the law is upon the subject of advertising.

Mr. SAYERS. What I want to know is the law bearing upon the printing of these postage stamps. I want to know what law there is that provides for the printing of these postage stamps under contract with private parties.

Mr. HAYES. I can tell you what you desire to know.

Mr. REED. There has got to be a positive provision of law authorizing this to be done.

Mr. DUNPHY. But permit me to say that I do not see what this has got to do with the question of order before the Chairman now. I know to what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SAYERS] refers, and if he will permit the debate to go on a little further, I think I can satisfy him on that point when we reach it in the debate.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, the question of law which now arises for consideration, to be submitted to the chairman and to the committee, is whether under the existing law the Secretary of the Treasury can allow the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to print adhesive postage stamps; the point of order being raised that the amendment submitted by my colleague changes existing law.

I shall endeavor to confine my remarks to the law and show to you, gentlemen, and to you, Mr. Chairman, that the existing law does not permit this Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury to do this work.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Then what is the use of the amendment?

Mr. BARTLETT. The necessity for the amendment is found in the expressions made by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General that they propose to violate the existing law.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. What law?

Mr. BARTLETT. They propose to violate irregularly and by indirection that which is now existing law.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Can you name any statute that they would violate by having this printing of stamps done at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing?

Mr. HAYES. Yes; section 3709.

Mr. BARTLETT. I propose to argue the question in my own way, and then I will answer the question of the gentleman.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Very well.

Mr. BARTLETT. I say under the construction of the law now advocated by me there has not been since the foundation of the Government, at any time since the question could possibly have arisen, such authority claimed by the Postmaster-General, or by the chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, or recognized by the Congress of the United States. Now for the first time it is sought to deprive us of our power, to take away from Congress the right to grant this privilege.

Bear with me for a moment, and I will add, in the first place, when these first opinions were delivered. The Solicitor of the Treasury, F. A. Reeve, has submitted an opinion in which he holds that this power already exists. That opinion was written on the 16th day of January. I shall ask to go back a little to show how this question arose, and in order to do so I must state some antecedent circumstances. In October last, under the provisions of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, which provides for advertising for contracts for supplies or purchases, the Postmaster-General advertised for bids for the printing of postage stamps for the ensuing four years. A special provision of law exempts this species of contracts from the rule that they can only obtain for one year. They advertised in October, and on the 15th day of November the bids were opened.

There were bids by the American Bank Note Company, by the Hamilton Bank Note Company, and by Charles F. Steele, of Philadelphia, ranging from $179,000 to $146,000. Up to that time it had been assumed by the Postmaster-General that that was the way they should be obtained. He had failed to secure any authorization from Congress to give this work to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. Five days later, after all the bids had been opened, after the competition had ceased, when these private individuals had submitted their bids, the Bureau of Engraving and Printing comes in and says "We will do this work for $139,000." Finding that the lowest bid was $5.25 a thousand, they come in and bid "five cents," without any security and giving no bond. A coordinate branch of the Government comes in and tries to take this work from the public competitors.

That is all right; but you must have some authority of law for such action. What is their authority? Mr. Claude M. Johnson, chief of this Bureau, then wrote to Mr. Reeve, Solicitor of the Treasury, asking his opinion on the existing law. Mr. Reeve wrote back saying that there was no express statute which sanctioned it, but that there was no prohibition of law as to work of that nature. That the printing of pension certificates and patent certificates had been assigned to this Bureau at the request of heads of Departments: and that under the same rule this work could be assigned to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. He said, "I assume that the provisions of section 3709 (that is as to advertising for contracts for supplies) have been duly complied with; and I assume that the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is the lowest and the best bidder."

That assumption was not correct. Mr. Reeve ascertained subsequently that the Bureau of Engraving and Printing had made no bid whatever. There his opinion fell. It was based on the assumption that the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was a competitor in the bidding, and that assumption being faulty, that opinion had to be abandoned. Then we have another opinion, an opinion sent to us in answer to a resolution of the House, an opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, in which an entirely new view of the law is taken. He gives a construction, rather, of the statutory provisions diametrically different, and based on entirely new views of the law; and that is sent only seven weeks after the Solicitor of the Department had rendered his former opinion.

Now, what is this new view of Mr. Carlisle as to the existing power to give this printing to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing? He draws attention first to that section of the Revised Statutes which provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may cause "notes" to be printed and engraved. Then he goes on and takes an excerpt from the sundry civil appropriation bill of March 3, 1877, where there is a provision making an appropriation for engraving and printing "notes, bonds, and other securities," and he says that the words there used by the Congress of the United States in that sundry civil appropriation bill were meant to cover postage stamps.

Why, gentlemen, have you ever heard of such an extraordinary interpretation of a law? Bear in mind that on that same day, the 3d day of March, 1877, in the Post-Office appropriation bill, which was passed by the Congress on that identical day, there was an appropriation of $150,000 made for adhesive postage stamps. Now, can it be contended that Congress, in the sundry civil appropriation bill, meant to refer to postage stamps under the term "securities" when they had passed another measure on the same day providing specifically for the manufacture of postage stamps. I say that in every statute of the United States where reference is intended to be made to postage stamps, the words "postage stamps" or "adhesive postage stamps" have been invariably used. But how is the web woven together?

The Secretary of the Treasury then goes a step further. He turns to the criminal statutes, to the Revised Statutes, chapter 70, as to crimes against the operations of the Government, and in section 5413 he finds a definition of what an obligation or other security of the United States is, and in that definition he finds a long enumeration of certificates, notes, bonds, checks, and stamps. Now, gentlemen, it is a familiar principle in the construction of statutory law that you can take no definition from a criminal statute and embody it in, or apply it in any way to, a statute regarding civil matters.

The definitions of crimes, as Sir James Fitz-James Stephen, the great English writer on criminal law who has just passed away, says the definitions are purposely made broad enough to cover and include all crimes of a cognate nature, and the only reason for making a distinction in the definition of such similar crimes is found in cases where the mode of trial, or the punishment would be different. So the definitions of crimes are often broadened beyond their ordinary meaning, just as we see the definition of "larceny" expanding and broadening from year to year, until it now includes many offenses which formerly were not comprehended under that term. I repeat, therefore, that a definition in a criminal statute, in an act referring entirely to forgery and counterfeiting, can not be legitimately taken from that criminal statute and made to apply in a case of this kind.

It is a forced, an unnatural, and unsound construction. I have never known an instance where a definition has been taken from a criminal statute and embodied in any act relating to a civil matter like this. I know of no decision of any court where such a view has been taken of the law, and I submit that this opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury is unsound. Now, let us see, aside from this, whether I am not right in my assertion that Congress has always taken the view for which I am now arguing. Bear in mind that this matter of printing adhesive postage stamps has come up for consideration before Congress on several occasions.

In 1879 it was proposed to allow these stamps to be printed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. The proposition was not agreed to either in the Senate or in the House, but through some error of an enrolling clerk it apparently became law and remained on the statute book for two years, until 1881, when it was repealed. The desired permission has never been granted since that time. An effort in that direction has been made on one or two occasions, in 1885 and in 1886. In the one instance such a provision was incorporated in the statute, but it failed to pass. In the other instance the Postmaster-General recommended that such permission be granted. In the report of the Secretary of the Treasury at the beginning of the last session will be found a suggestion that Congress should pass such legislation. Now, if the power existed in the Department at the time, that suggestion would have been entirely inapposite and inappropriate.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I desire to submit just one proposition, Mr. Chairman. If there is no existing law touching this matter the amendment is out of order because it is new legislation. If there is a law, it is out of order because it changes that existing law. So let the fact be either way he pleases, the gentleman is "out in the cold" on this proposition.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. There is another point in regard to this matter to which I wish to call attention, and that is that a contract has been made with the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair submits to the gentleman that that relates to the merits of the proposition and does not affect the point of order.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. It affects the law.

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. What is the measure of damages if the Government makes a contract and then turns round and breaks it?

A MEMBER. Six cents.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. The question here is whether this amendment is a new law or a change of law. It seems to me it must to be one or the other; and it is not only a new law or a change of law, but it is in violation of a contract made under the law.

Mr. DUNPHY. All that we claim is that the amendment is a declaration of the existing law.

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, the question of order is very largely determined, of course, by the question whether there is any existing law on this subject, and if so, what the law is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be very glad to hear the gentleman on that point and to receive any information he can give.

Mr. HAYES. Now, the position I take, from the examination I have made of this subject, is that there is no law authorizing the printing of these stamps by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. Consequently, in my view, the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York is simply declaratory of the view of Congress in regard to the existing law; so that the point of order is governed by precisely the same principles that applied in the settlement of the question decided to-day with regard to the admission of fraternal journals in the mails as second class matter.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I wish to ask the gentleman a question for information. Does the law authorize the Postmaster-General to let this contract to any party or parties?

Mr. HAYES. Yes, sir.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. I suggest the gentleman is mistaken. The section of the Revised Statutes does not name any party at all.

Mr. HAYES. I do not know that I understood the gentleman's question.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Does the present law authorize the Postmaster-General to let this contract to any specified party?

Mr. HAYES. The present law provides in section 3914 of the Revised Statutes that—

The Postmaster-General shall prepare postage stamps of suitable denominations, which, when attached to mail matter, shall be evidence of the payment of the postage thereon.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, if the gentleman will refer——

Mr. HAYES. Section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, under which all these things are done where power is given as in the section I have just read, provides—

All purchases and contracts for supplies or services, in any of the Departments of the Government, except for personal services, shall be made by advertising a sufficient time previously for proposals respecting the same, when the public exigencies do not require the immediate delivery of the articles, or performance of the service.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Now, to bring out the point which I have suggested, I will ask the gentleman this question: Could not the Postmaster-General, under the law, award this contract to a railroad company, a mercantile company, a steamboat company, or any other company or person in the world?

Mr. HAYES. I presume so.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Then could he not award it to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing?

Mr. HAYES. No, sir; because the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is simply a bureau of the Government itself; and the idea which the gentleman suggests in its legitimate consequences would lead to the conclusion that the Government, through its various Departments, can do anything that it sees fit; that it need not advertise at all; need not let contracts at all, but can set up all kinds of manufacturing establishments and do business incident to the manufacture of everything that the Government may need in all its Departments, from the greatest to the smallest. It would simply manufacture and pay what it cost, which might be more or less than private parties would do it for. There would be no occasion to advertise for bids, and this law would be nugatory and useless.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. The Government is now carrying on its own manufacturing in the case of guns, ammunition, etc.

Mr. HAYES. So far as I am concerned, I agree with the organized labor of this country, which protests against the Government going into these various branches of business or interfering with private enterprise. I certainly would not extend a system of this kind, and wherever possible I would restrict it, even where it now exists by law or custom.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Does the gentleman contend that there should be a positive enactment of law before the Bureau of Engraving and Printing can do this work?

Mr. HAYES. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Where does the gentleman find any authority for that position?

Mr. HAYES. In the utter absence of any law allowing the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to do this work, and in the fact that universally, or at any rate generally, where Congress has thought it proper that work of this kind should be performed in that Bureau a specific provision to that effect has been adopted; and here, as showing understanding, I will say that the Post-Office Department has several times asked for this authority and never before has attempted to exercise it under any existing law. I have here a compilation of various laws passed on this subject from time to time, as well as practice; and I will ask unanimous consent to incorporate them with my remarks in the RECORD, as they are material in the consideration of this question. They are as follows:

What is now the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department had its origin in section 2 of chapter 142 of the Thirty-seventh Congress, session 3, passed July 11, 1862, which is embodied in the Revised Statutes as follows:

"SEC. 3677. The Secretary of the Treasury may cause notes to be engraved, printed, and executed at the Department of the Treasury in Washington, and under his direction, if he deems it inexpedient to procure them to be engraved and printed by contract, and he may purchase and provide all the machinery and materials, and employ such persons and appoint such officers as are necessary for this purpose."

The other statutes relating to the work of the Bureau are as follows:

Chapter 123, Fortieth Congress, session 3, March 3, 1869, contains the following proviso:

"Provided, That no work shall be done in the Engraving and Printing Bureau for private parties."

This is the first mention of a "bureau."

Chapter 338, Forty-third Congress, session 1, June 20, 1874, appropriates money for the "Bureau of Engraving and Printing." This is the first time that the Bureau is designated by that name and the first time that appropriations are made specifically for its use.

Chapter 287, Forty-fourth Congress, session 1, August 15, 1876, appropriates, under heading of Commissioner of Internal Revenue, as follows:

"For dies, paper, and stamps, $165,000; said engraving and printing to be done in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department, provided the cost does not exceed the price paid under existing contracts."

Chapter 18, Forty-fourth Congress, session 2, December 28, 1876, enacts:

"That such sum as may be necessary be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to have engraved and printed a portrait of Hon. Henry H. Starkweather, of Connecticut, deceased, late a member of the House of Representatives, as authorized by the resolution of the House of Representatives of May 5, 1876, and concurred in by the Senate May 20, 1876; said portraits to accompany the eulogies ordered to be printed by the same resolution."

Mem.: The resolution referred to does not appear in the Statutes at Large as published. This act is the first of a long series of acts and joint resolutions directing the Secretary of the Treasury to engrave portraits and appropriating money therefor.

Chapter 102, Forty-fourth Congress, session 2, March 3, 1877, appropriates for internal-revenue stamps in the same language as the act of August 15, 1876.

Chapter 329, Forty-fifth Congress, session 2, June 19, 1878:

Do. do., except amount is $375,000.

Chapter 359, Forty-fifth Congress, session 2, June 20, 1878, appropriates money for new building "to be devoted to the use of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department, to the mechanical purposes of other bureaus and branches of said Department, and to like purposes of bureaus of other Departments."

Chapter 182, Forty-fifth Congress, session 3, March 3, 1879, appropriates:

"For payment of expenses of printing pension checks for fiscal year 1879, $8,500, and for the fiscal year 1880, $9,000."

Chapter 180, Forty-fifth Congress, session 3, March 3, 1879, appropriates:

"For the manufacture of adhesive postage stamps, of official stamps, and of newspaper and periodical stamps, $92,000. If said stamps can be furnished by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department at less than the same now cost, the work of printing the same shall be given to said Bureau when not in violation of existing contracts."

Repealed March 1, 1881, chapter 96, Forty-sixth Congress, session 3.

Chapter 183, Forty-fifth Congress, session 3, March 3, 1879, appropriates:

"To adjust the settled account of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, Treasury Department, for printing commissions of revenue-marine officers, involving no expenditure of money from the Treasury, being for the service of the fiscal year 1877, $63.80.

"To adjust the settled account of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for engraving, printing, and similar necessary expenses, disbursing officers' transfer and interest checks, involving no expenditure of money from the Treasury, being for the year 1878, $1,392.80."

Chapter 2, Forty-sixth Congress, session 2, December 22, 1879, provides:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury, at the request of a Senator, Representative, or Delegate in Congress, the head of a Department or bureau, art association or library, be, and he is hereby, authorized to furnish impressions from any portrait or vignette which is now or may hereafter be a part of the engraved stock of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, at such rates and under such conditions as he may deem necessary to protect the public interests."

Chapter 225, Forty-sixth Congress, session 2, June 15, 1880:

Appropriates $375,000 for internal-revenue stamps in language of act of August 15, 1876.

Chapter 130, Forty-sixth Congress, session 3, March 3, 1881, appropriates for the internal revenue:

"For dies, paper, and stamps, $442,000, but not exceeding $49,000 of this amount may be expended in the payment of persons employed in connection with the manufacture of paper and the production of stamps and their custody and issue; the engraving and printing to be done in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, That the cost does not exceed the price paid under existing contracts."

Chapter 433, Forty-seventh Congress, session 1, August 7, 1882, appropriates for the internal revenue:

"For dies, paper, and stamps, $500,000; the engraving and printing to be done in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury."

Chapter 143, Forty-seventh Congress, session 2, March 3, 1883, appropriates for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing as follows:

"For salaries of all necessary clerks and employés, and for labor (by the day, piece, or contract), including labor of workmen skilled in engraving, transferring, plate printing, and other specialties necessary for carrying on the work of engraving and printing, the pay for such labor to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, at rates not exceeding the rates usually paid for such work; and for other expenses of engraving and printing; for materials required in the work of engraving and printing; for purchase of engravers' tools, dies, rolls, and plates, and for machinery and repairs of same and for expenses of operating macerating machines for the destruction of the United States notes, bonds, national-bank notes, and other obligations of the United States authorized to be destroyed, $485,700, and from said sum work may be executed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the following purposes, namely:

"For engraving, printing, and finishing United States notes, gold and silver certificates, registered bonds for transfers, and other securities, $361,000.

"For engraving (except face-plates), printing, and finishing circulating notes for national banking associations, $105,000.

"For engraving, printing, and finishing checks for the Treasurer of the United States and disbursing officers, and for the purchase of paper for the same, $7,000.

"For engraving, printing, and finishing checks for the payment of pensions, $12,000.

"For engraving, printing, and finishing certificates of letters patents, $700."

Chapter 332, Forty-eighth Congress, session 1, July 7, 1884, appropriates:

"For paper and stamps for the Bureau of Internal Revenue, $410,000, the engraving and printing of said stamps to be done in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury."

And for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing substantially as in the act of March 3, 1883.

Chapter 359, Forty-eighth Congress, session 2, March 3, 1885, deficiency appropriation:

"To pay amounts found due by the accounting officers of the Treasury on account of labor and expenses of engraving and printing, being for the service of the fiscal year 1882, $234.67."

Chapter 360, Forty-eighth Congress, session 2, March 3, 1885, appropriates:

Substantially as in the act of July 7, 1884.

Chapter 902, Forty-ninth Congress, session 1, August 4, 1886:

"Provided, That hereafter receipts for miscellaneous work authorized by law to be performed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the several Departments of the Government, and the amounts properly chargeable to national banks for engraving their plates shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

Chapter 903, Forty-ninth Congress, session 1, August 4, 1886:

"To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for engraving, printing, and finishing certificates of letters patent the sum of $435, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the unexpended balance of the general appropriation for labor and expenses of engraving and printing for the current year is hereby authorized to be used for the object herein specified."

Chapter 1069, Fiftieth Congress, session 1, October 2, 1888, appropriates for the Bureau:

"Provided, That there shall not be an increase of the number of steam plate-printing machines in the Engraving and Printing Bureau."

Chapter 411, Fiftieth Congress, session 2, March 2, 1889:

"Provided further, That there shall not be an increase of the number of steam plate-printing machines in the Engraving and Printing Bureau * * *

"Provided, That unless the patentees of said steam presses shall accept the $500 already paid as royalty on each press and the rate per thousand sheets herein provided [1 cent] the said presses shall not be used by the Government after the close of the present fiscal year."

Chapter 381, Fifty-second Congress, session 1, as amended March 3, 1893, by chapter 208, Fifty-second Congress, session 2, provides as follows:

"SEC. 3. That not to exceed 50,000 bronze medals, and the necessary dies therefor, with appropriate devices, emblems, and inscriptions commemorative of the said exposition celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the discovery of America by Christopher Columbus, shall be prepared under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury; and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall prepare plates and make therefrom not to exceed 50,000 impressions for diplomas at a total cost not to exceed $103,000. Said medals and diplomas shall be delivered to the World's Columbian Commission, to be awarded to exhibitors in accordance with the provisions of said act of Congress approved April 25, 1890; and there is hereby appropriated from any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $103,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay the expenditures authorized by this section."

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. But there is no statute prohibiting this work from being done by that Bureau.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. No, nor by anybody else.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. And the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is one of the bureaus of the Government, and the stamps are needed by the Government. Why should they not be printed there?

Mr. HAYES. I will say in response to that, rather than by answering yes or no, that the law is explicit and will show what the statutes are in regard to this very question.

The opinion of the Solicitor of the Treasury was asked in regard to this matter by the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and the letter was written which was referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] and in which he states what the authority is, so far as he finds it under the law, and as that authority is given by the law officer of the Treasury Department it is probably unnecessary to go further. I think the proper construction, from the standpoint on which he bases it, will show the utter fallacy of his position and demonstrate that there is no law, existing on the statute books today or outside, that allows the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to enter into competition for doing this work.

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. But why should not the Government, if it has a Bureau of Engraving and Printing equipped for all purposes, run it for this purpose just as it has a bureau of public printing to do the printing for the Departments and for Congress?

Mr. HAYES. Why, under the same reasoning, should not the Government do all kinds of business where it has needs and enter into competition with private business through all parts of the country for all its needed supplies?

Mr. MCCREARY of Kentucky. But the gentleman does not answer my question. Why does the Government support a Government Printing Office and a Bureau of Engraving and Printing if it can not use them for doing its own work?

Mr. HAYES. We support a Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the purpose of doing certain specified printing for the Treasury and other Departments, and a Printing Office because in the very nature of things we are compelled to have some work done with a celerity and under circumstances that can not be accomplished by any private office. But this is a matter that is obviously in a different category, and, in any event, I am opposed to the extension of governmental business and competition with private business enterprise. It tends toward centralization and paternalism.

Mr. BARTLETT. Let me ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that all of the internal-revenue stamps are now printed by express authority of Congress?

Mr. HAYES. Yes, sir; and that is in the compilation of the laws which I put into the RECORD.

Mr. COX. Let me ask the gentleman a question: Does not the Bureau of Engraving and Printing propose to do the printing of these stamps at a less price than anybody else proposes?

Mr. HAYES. Well, I think not. The Bureau put in a bid after the advertised time at a less price, and this was met by a private bidder and a still lower offer made.

Mr. COX. That is a very important point.

Mr. HAYES. But whether it did or not is not material for the purpose of this discussion. In the first place, we would never know what it did cost the Government.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. Oh, yes.

Mr. HAYES. It could not be ascertained whether it was done at a profit or at a loss. They would have to get the plant for the work, purchase machinery, and all that sort of thing, and this work would run along in connection with all of the other work of the Bureau, so that it could not possibly be accurately separated for the purpose of determining the cost. Wear and tear, cost of machinery and plant, and various such matters would debar accuracy in this regard.

Mr. LOCKWOOD. You say we could not know what the cost would be. Does not that Bureau make a bid for the work at 5 cents per thousand?

Mr. HAYES. Yes; but suppose it costs 10? There is no restriction. They can spend the whole appropriation on this work if they think it necessary, and its bid cuts no figure. It would be just the same, with same result, whether bid was 1 cent or $1 a thousand. When a man works for himself it makes no difference what he calls his wages.

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order. It seems to me that gentlemen are drifting away from the point of order to the merits of the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be very glad to hear gentlemen on the point of order.

Mr. HAYES. The ground on which the Solicitor of the Treasury puts this right, so far as the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is concerned, is section 3577 of the Revised Statutes, which reads:

SEC. 3577. The Secretary of the Treasury may cause notes to be engraved, printed, and executed at the Department of the Treasury, in Washington, and under his direction, if he deems it inexpedient to procure them to be engraved and printed by contract; and he may purchase and provide all the machinery and materials, and employ such persons and appoint such officers as are necessary for this purpose.

That is the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. This is a bureau of the Treasury Department, and it finds authority in this statute, according to the Solicitor of the Treasury, by which postage stamps can be printed there.

Now, in the first place to arrive at such a conclusion the Solicitor has to say that postage stamps are notes, when everybody knows the meaning of that word as used in the section I have read is essentially different. This word referred to the currency of the Government. That construction is entirely farfetched, and has no merit of any name or nature; is a mere subterfuge. In addition to that, after speaking of the matter as it has been up before Congress from time to time, the Solicitor says that the repeal of a certain provision, which I will refer to in a few minutes, had the effect of putting it back in statu quo, where it was, and that it stands now as though Congress had not done anything, either passed the section or repealed it. That proposition I entirely deny and dissent from, either as a matter of reason or of law or statutory construction.

This matter has been up before Congress upon three different occasions. In the first place, in 1879 a provision was inserted in the law which gave the Bureau of Engraving and Printing the power to do this very thing; but it has always been claimed that it never passed Congress; in other words, that it was an interpolation, that it was stricken out by the action of Congress and that it got in by a mistake of the enrolling clerks. In any event, that was very soon repealed, and I say that shows a legislative intent in regard to this matter that entirely brushes away the idea that the Solicitor of the Treasury seeks to convey as his legal proposition in the letter that he submits to the Superintendent of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. It shows of itself a legislative intent and meaning.

Then again, in 1886, the Postmaster-General recommended the attachment to the Post-Office appropriation bill of a provision of this kind. I believe it was passed in one House, and finally, upon conference, was lost. In any event, without being absolutely certain as to the details of it, as a matter of fact it did not pass Congress; so that the recommendation of the Postmaster-General was not carried into effect.

Mr. SAYERS. What House did it pass?

Mr. HAYES. It passed the House of Representatives.

Mr. SAYERS. But was defeated in the Senate?

Mr. HAYES. Defeated in the Senate. Then, in 1888, the Postmaster-General again recommended an amendment to an appropriation bill, providing for this same thing, and that failed to pass; and now the present Postmaster-General has asked and recommended the same legislation here. In the face of the treatment of this law by the various Departments of the Government, how it can be claimed that there does exist upon the part of the Department the power to have this work done in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, is beyond my comprehension. We have, so far as the action of Congress is concerned, a legislative interpretation of its intention in passing such laws as it has passed, including laws for the organization and management of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Now, I do not know that I care to say anything more upon this question, but I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD, as a part of my remarks, an argument prepared by the American Bank Note Company, which gives a full and comprehensive statement of the surroundings and reasons governing the question and also extracts from previous debates, showing how it has been considered in Congress, and which has an important bearing upon the question of what the law actually is; that is, showing intent when passed, as follows:

STATEMENT OF SITUATION.

Congress has imposed upon the Postmaster-General the duty of providing postage stamps for the payment of postage on mail matter by legislation which is embodied in section 3914 of the Revised Statutes, as follows:

"The Postmaster-General shall prepare postage stamps of suitable denominations which, when attached to mail matter, shall be evidence of the payment of postage thereon."

In like manner the Postmaster-General has been authorized to procure stamped envelopes and postal cards by sections 3915 and 3916 of the Revised Statutes, and provision has subsequently been made for the procurement by him of stamped letter sheets, return envelopes, and reply postal cards. All these supplies have been heretofore invariably procured by the Postmaster-General under the requirements of section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, as follows:

"All purchases and contracts for supplies or services in any of the Departments of the Government, except for personal services, shall be made by advertising a sufficient time previously for proposals respecting the same, when the public exigencies do not require the immediate delivery of the articles or performance of the service."

By joint resolution of March 24, 1874, it is provided that the limitation of one year for letting contracts for supplies in the Executive Departments "shall not be held or construed to be applied to or include mail bags, mail locks or keys, postal cards, postage stamps, newspaper wrappers, or stamped envelopes."

It had been the custom of the Post-Office Department before the adoption of this joint resolution, and it has since been its custom, to make contracts for supplies of this character for the period of four years after advertisement inviting proposals therefor, published in the newspapers for a period of four weeks prior to the date fixed for the receipt of such proposals.

In pursuance of the requirements of law and the custom of the Department, in October, 1893, when the then-pending contract for the supply of adhesive postage stamps was about to expire, the Postmaster-General published an advertisement inviting sealed proposals for furnishing stamps under detailed specifications to be opened on the 15th day of November, 1893, and upon the opening of the bids the bidders and the amounts of their respective bids, based upon the actual issue of postage stamps for the year ending June 30, 1893, were found to be as follows:

The Hamilton Bank Note Company, of New York	$179,294.00
The American Bank Note Company, of New York	162,401.51
Charles F. Steele, of Philadelphia	146,454.71

Five days after the receipt and opening of these bids, submitted in compliance with the law, on the 20th day of November, 1893, the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department submitted to the Postmaster-General an estimate of the cost of furnishing the adhesive postage stamps, if manufactured in his Bureau, amounting to $139,487.52. This offer, submitted in the light of the figures given by the bidders under the advertisement, it will be observed, is a mere shade less than the lowest bid submitted under the advertisement.

Subsequently, by an order of the Postmaster-General, all the bids received under the advertisement therefor were rejected and an arrangement has been made under which, if carried out, the postage stamps are to be manufactured and furnished to the Post-Office Department on and after the 1st of July, 1894, by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

THE PROPOSED ACTION IS WITHOUT AUTHORITY OF LAW.

This proposed action on the part of the Post-Office Department and the Treasury Department is wholly unauthorized by existing law; the Postmaster-General proposing to procure supplies practically without advertisement, and therefore in disregard of law, by assigning the work to another Department of the Government. Clearly, if this action is authorized by law, the Postmaster-General could with equal propriety have awarded the contract to a private party proposing to do the work at a cost lower than that of the lowest competing bidder, and this proposition is manifestly untenable; certainly, if this course can be pursued, the head of an Executive Department can subvert the whole purpose of the law respecting advertisement for proposals, and there would be no longer any occasion for such provision.

This proposed arrangement also involves a defiance of law on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury, as well as of the Postmaster-General, because an examination of the statute books will fail to find the least authority for the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to undertake the performance of this work.

REFUSAL OF CONGRESS IN THE PAST TO AUTHORIZE MANUFACTURE OF POSTAGE STAMPS BY THE BUREAU.

Not only is there no authority in the statutes, but the whole course of legislation by Congress indicates that it has never been willing to throw this work into this already overcrowded and overworked Bureau of the Treasury Department.

The Bureau of Engraving and Printing had its origin, unlike the other bureaus of the various Executive Departments which have been erected by specific acts of Congress, in legislation which permitted the Secretary of the Treasury, if he deemed it expedient, to cause notes to be engraved, printed, and executed in his Department, and authorized him to purchase and provide all the necessary machinery and materials and to employ such persons and appoint such officers as were necessary for this purpose. This legislation has been embodied in the Revised Statutes, in section 3577, which is as follows:

"SEC. 3577. The Secretary of the Treasury may cause notes to be engraved, printed, and executed at the Department of the Treasury in Washington, and under his direction, if he deems it inexpedient to procure them to be engraved and printed by contract, and he may purchase and provide all the machinery and materials and employ such persons and appoint such officers as are necessary for this purpose."

From time to time Congress has provided that other work should be performed in this Bureau, nearly the whole of which, however, has been work for the Department of the Treasury itself, and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing has been accustomed to do for other Departments of the Government certain work of insignificant amount and trifling cost.

Not only is there no authority conferred by Congress upon the Bureau for doing this work, but such action as Congress has taken with respect to the Post-Office matters shows that it has taken the position not only that the Bureau without legislation has not the authority to do the work but that it will withhold such authority whenever asked. This is shown by the fact that when Congress provided for the issue of postal notes and for a revision of the money-order system, it required the Public Printer and the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to submit estimates of the cost of furnishing such printed and engraved matter as might be required for use in the money-order business, and should furnish such matter whenever upon their estimates of costs the expenditures therefor would be less than upon proposals received from private bidders. (See chapter 123, Forty-seventh Congress, second session, volume 22, page 527, United States Statutes at large.)

The public records show that three several efforts have been made to throw this work into the hands of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and that such efforts have failed. The history of these three several efforts is as follows:

First. In the Post-Office appropriation act passed March 3, 1879, Congress appropriated for the manufacture of postage stamps $92,000, with the proviso that "if such stamps can be furnished by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department at less than the same now cost, the work of printing the same shall be given to said Bureau when not in violation of existing contracts." This proviso was not reported by the Committee on Appropriations, but was attached to the bill on motion of a Representative from the State of Illinois.

The language of this proviso was modified in the Senate, but upon a reference of the bill to the committee of conference of the two Houses the whole matter was stricken out. But, as was subsequently shown, probably through an error of the enrollment clerk, the proviso found its way into the statute book, and accordingly two years later was expressly repealed by chapter 96 of the Forty-sixth Congress, session 3, passed March 1, 1881, it appearing in the debate that it never had been the intention of Congress to enact the proviso.

Second. In the Post-Office appropriation act for the service of the year ending June 30, 1883, the House of Representatives, upon the recommendation of the Postmaster-General, attached a clause to the appropriation for adhesive stamps requiring "that at the future lettings of contracts for the manufacture of postage stamps, stamped envelopes, and postal cards the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required to submit bids for the manufacture of said stamps, stamped envelopes, and postal cards by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department, which bids shall be considered in competition with bids from private parties; but provided that the Postmaster-General may award the contracts, or any of them, upon the bids of the Secretary of the Treasury without reference to the bids of private parties, if, in his judgment, it shall be for the best interest of the Government to do so." This provision was, after an exhaustive debate, stricken from the bill when the same was under consideration by the Senate, and the action of the Senate was confirmed by the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses and by the two Houses themselves separately on the conference report.

In this case Congress expressly refused to authorize the line of action which has been followed by the Post-Office and the Treasury Departments in the case of the postage-stamp contract.

Third. The Postmaster-General in his annual report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1883, recommended that an amendment be inserted in the appropriation bill for the next fiscal year providing that "the work of manufacturing postage stamps, stamped envelopes, and postal cards, now performed by contract under public advertisement, shall hereafter be done by the Government itself, the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and the Treasury Department, at a cost not to exceed the prices in the present contract and without resort to the system of competitive bidding now in force."

This recommendation, however, failed to receive any attention from either branch of Congress.

It will thus be seen that it has always been the intention of Congress that this work of manufacturing and supplying postage stamps, postal cards, stamped envelopes, etc., for the Post-Office Department, which had always been satisfactorily performed by private parties, should not be done in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and by reference to the debates in Congress when the question has come up it will be found that the objection has proceeded upon the broad ground of public policy, which, under our institutions, should prevent the Government from engaging in this work of administration.

Citations from these debates are appended hereto, to which special attention is respectfully invited.

THE BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING HAS NEVER BEFORE CLAIMED TO HAVE AUTHORITY TO MANUFACTURE POSTAGE STAMPS.

The foregoing statement of the various attempts to procure Congressional authority for the manufacture of postage stamps by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing clearly indicates that without further legislation such authority was supposed to be wholly wanting, and the records show that it has never before been claimed on behalf of the Bureau that it had such authority.

In 1885, when Congress was asked to require the Bureau to submit estimates or bids in competition with private bidders, it was assumed by the chief of the Bureau in a letter addressed to the Third Assistant Postmaster-General, which is printed in Ex. Doc. No. 202, H. R. Forty-eighth Congress, second session, as follows: "This Bureau is organized to execute the work of engraving and printing securities of the United States required by the Treasury Department. It has no wish to extend its work beyond the purpose of its organization, unless it be to the advantage of the Government and unless the officers of the Government specially charged with the supervision of work of this kind desire it to be done here."

In the same year, 1885, the chief of the Bureau, in submitting his report and estimates to Congress, complains of the condition of the appropriations; asks that his department be recognized as a regular bureau, and states that "should new work at any time be by law assigned to the Bureau, there could be added to the appropriation an amount sufficient to pay the operatives and purchase the materials required to produce it."

It is evident that when the report of the Secretary of the Treasury was transmitted to Congress at the present session (Fifty-third Congress, second session) it was well understood by the Department that the Bureau did not have authority to manufacture postage stamps, for in speaking of the work of engraving and printing executed in the Bureau he makes the following recommendation:

"The most considerable work of this kind now executed outside of the Bureau is the postage stamps and postal notes required by the Post-Office Department. It might be well for Congress to consider the advisability of having this portion of the work of the Government also executed by this Bureau, as it has all the facilities for executing it and would afford perfect security to the Government. It would seem to present an anomalous condition of affairs for the Government to maintain a large establishment for the execution of this character of work and yet have a part of it done in private establishments."

THE PRESENT CLAIM OF AUTHORITY FOR THE BUREAU IS WITHOUT FOUNDATION.

It now appears from the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury to the resolution of the House of Representatives inquiring under authority of what law the Bureau proposes to manufacture adhesive postage stamps, that he professes to find authority in section 3577 of the Revised Statutes, quoted above, supplemented by the appropriation acts providing for labor and expenses of printing notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, claiming that under these laws the Bureau is organized for the engraving, printing, and finishing of the securities and other obligations of the United States, and is authorized to execute the work that falls within this designation, and inasmuch as "obligations or other securities" are by section 5413, Revised Statutes, held to mean, among other things, "stamps," that the Bureau has authority to manufacture postage stamps.

A sufficient answer to this proposition would seem to be a reference to the past attempts at legislation and the record of the attitude of the Departments on the question; for if the Bureau has the authority now to manufacture postage stamps, it had the same authority when legislation therefor was specially sought and was advisedly withheld by Congress.

A slight consideration of the statutes relied upon will suffice to show that they do not support the proposition advanced. Without urging that the language of section 5413 is intended to apply only to crimes and so might be held not to have been intended as a definition of obligations and securities applicable to all cases and circumstances, it is sufficient to say that an appropriation act providing money for the purpose of the manufacture of such securities as the Bureau is lawfully engaged in making is far from requiring or authorizing the Bureau to manufacture all the securities of the Government.

In order to give the statutes cited by the Secretary of the Treasury the effect claimed for them it is necessary to find in the appropriation acts some requirement, or at least authority, for the Bureau to perform the work of making (besides and in addition to the notes, bonds, and securities for which money is thereby provided) all of the securities of the Government, and this is evidently impossible. This pretense of authority is so manifestly unwarranted by the statutes that it is difficult to consider it seriously or treat it with patience.

PRESENT INABILITY OF THE BUREAU TO PERFORM THE WORK.

But, besides and beyond the want of legal authority to carry out the proposed undertaking to furnish postage stamps by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, it is practically impossible for the Secretary of the Treasury lawfully to put the Bureau in a position to perform the work, it appearing by the estimates submitted that under present appropriations, and with the present accommodations of the Bureau, it is unable satisfactorily to perform the work upon which it is now employed.

Section 3679 of the Revised Statutes provides that "No Department of the Government shall expend in any one fiscal year any sum in excess of appropriations made by Congress for that fiscal year or involve the Government in any contract for the future payment of money in excess of such appropriations."

Section 3732 provides that "No contract or purchase on behalf of the United States shall be made unless the same is authorized by law, or is under an appropriation adequate to its fulfillment, except in the War and Navy Department," etc.

The Treasury Department, therefore, not having sufficient money for its present purposes, will be unable under the limitations of these sections of the Revised Statutes to make the necessary provision to equip the Bureau for the performance of the proposed work or to procure the workmen and provide the material therefor. The supply of stamps must be commenced on the 1st of July, 1894, and to provide therefor will require machinery, labor, and supplies to be procured long in advance of that date, which is coincident with the termination of the current fiscal year, the appropriations for which are all required for the needs of the Bureau for the performance of the work now done by it.

In submitting estimates for the Bureau for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, the Treasury Department has asked for $130,000 for buildings, and $1,111,400 for expenses, and has represented that its present accommodations are wholly insufficient for the performance of the work now intrusted to it and that an additional building is required for that reason.

These estimates were submitted by the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in a letter dated October 16, 1893, in which letter no mention is made of any intention to do the work of printing and furnishing postage stamps.

The estimate was based on the then existing needs of the Bureau, and it was not concurred in by the Committee on Appropriations, which has fixed the amounts in the sundry civil appropriation bill at a less amount than was asked for and without providing money for the erection of the new building desired.

With these estimates and appropriations for the present needs of the Bureau how will it be possible for it to equip itself to perform this great additional amount of work? The Bureau of Engraving and Printing is confessedly without equipment to perform this work, and if the Government is going to provide the Post-Office Department with stamps by their manufacture in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, it will be necessary to expend a large sum of money for equipment besides the estimated cost of providing the stamps, and thereby the expense to the Government of procuring postage stamps through the Bureau will be increased by that amount over and above its estimated cost of production.

This additional money required to procure a plant for the performance of the work will largely exceed the difference between the Bureau's estimate of cost and that of the private bidders under the advertisement for proposals.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his communication to the House of Representatives above referred to, states that no additional appropriation will be made necessary by the manufacture of postage stamps by the Bureau over and above the amount to be paid by the Post-Office Department under the terms of the proposal therefor.

It is difficult to understand how this can be, when the performance of the work, which will involve an increase of the work of the Bureau of about 20 per cent, will require the procurement of additional machinery and materials and the employment of a largely increased force of employés. To provide for the cost of additional plant and materials and of increased force will require the immediate use of large sums of money over and above the estimated cost of production, and before there will be any receipts from the Post-Office Department, if such can be obtained and used.

But, assuming that there is lawful authority for the Post-Office Department to make payments to the Bureau for postage stamps furnished by it, as to which there is grave question, it is not competent for the Secretary of the Treasury under existing provisions of law to devote any such payments to the procurement of machinery and materials and the hiring of labor for the purposes of the Bureau, for such use of money is expressly forbidden by Congress by chapter 902, Forty-ninth Congress, first session, passed August 4, 1886, which contains the following proviso:

"Provided, That hereafter receipts for miscellaneous work authorized by law to be performed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the several departments of the Government and the amounts properly chargeable to national banks for engraving their plates shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts."

A further difficulty in the way of the performance of this work by the Bureau is that it is proposed to print the stamps on steam presses, which, indeed, is the only practicable way in which they can be produced, and that to do this it will be necessary to procure additional steam presses, which is now expressly forbidden by law, Congress having provided in chapter 1009, Fiftieth Congress, first session, passed Oct. 2, 1888, as follows:

Provided, That there shall not be an increase of the number of steam plate-printing machines in the Engraving and Printing Bureau.

THE OFFER OF THE BUREAU DOES NOT REPRESENT THE ACTUAL COST TO THE GOVERNMENT OF DOING THE WORK.

Even after provision is made for the performance of this work by the procurement of additional plant and material and employes it will not be possible for the Bureau to furnish and distribute the postage stamps as required by the specifications of the Post-Office Department, at the estimated cost of 5 cents per thousand.

The figures and estimates of the Bureau as furnished by itself conclusively show that the cost to the Government of procuring the manufacture and distribution of the postage stamps would be far in excess of the estimate of 5 cents per thousand. On the only occasion when the Bureau ever estimated before on the stamp contract, when it competed with private bidders in 1885, its estimate of cost was 7.75 cents per thousand, which was higher than that of the American Bank Note Company, to which the contract was awarded under its bid of 6.99 cents per thousand. Its present estimate is more than 55 per cent less, and it is impossible to suppose that there has been in the meantime any such reduction in the cost of the performance of the work of the Bureau as to justify and sustain it.

The estimates made by the Bureau of the cost of the work actually performed by it are, however, the best evidence of its inability to furnish and distribute the stamps at the cost now estimated, and conclusively establish the truth of that proposition. In the Book of Estimates submitted to the present session of Congress (Fifty-third Congress, second session,) the chief of the Bureau estimates that the average cost per thousand printings for the year ending June 30, 1895, will be $17.26.

The estimate of the average cost of the finished product of the Bureau per thousand sheets is much higher; but as a great deal of the work, the currency and bank-notes for instance, is subjected to two or more printings, the average cost, for purposes of estimate and comparison, is very properly reduced from sheets to printings. Postage stamps require but one printing and are produced in sheets containing 200 stamps each, so that 200,000 stamps will represent a thousand printings—the basis of the Bureau's estimate of cost of its present work. The cost of 5 cents per thousand stamps reduced to the basis of thousand printings makes the Bureau's estimate of cost of stamps $10 per thousand printings, as against the cost of $17.26 of its other work, a difference of over 42 per cent.

It is utterly impossible to believe that the Bureau can turn out postage stamps at any such cost. Nor does this comparison tell the whole story. It is impossible for the Bureau to manufacture postage stamps at as low a cost as it produces other work, much less to manufacture and distribute them to over 70,000 post-offices, as required by the specifications of the Post-Office Department contract. In the first place, a large amount of the work of the Bureau consists of type printing, a cheaper method than the plate printing required for postage stamps, and a very large proportion of such work consists of sheets of smaller size than those upon which stamps are printed; and in the second place, the estimate of $17.26 per thousand printings includes no charge for paper and practically none for gumming, perforating, packing, and distribution, a charge for all of which must enter into any proper estimate of the cost of performing the stamp contract.

To arrive, then, at an accurate estimate of the cost of postage stamps to the Government there must be added the cost of paper, gumming, perforating, and packing for distribution, each operation in itself entailing no inconsiderable expense and requiring many employés to perform under a contract requiring the average daily manufacture and distribution of some ten millions of stamps. The private contractor has, of course, to add to these items of cost rent, insurance, taxes, and interest on cost of plant, which are not out-of-pocket expenses for the Government Bureau, but the expenses of which have to be met in one way or another so long as there is an interest-bearing debt and which, it might fairly be urged, should be taken into account in arriving at the true cost to the Government of doing the work.

To summarize this comparison we have:

Bureau's estimate of cost per thousand printings, including labor, materials and administration only	$17.26
Bureau's estimate of cost of furnishing a thousand sheets of postage stamps, which should cover cost of paper, gumming, perforating, packing, and distribution, which are actual expenses, and rent, insurance, taxes, and interest on plant, which must be met in one shape or another	10.00
Difference in estimates over 42 per cent	7.26

Another mode of presenting a comparison of these estimates by reducing the Bureau's estimate of average cost per thousand printings for the year ending June 30, 1895, to the basis of the stamp contract price gives the following:

	Cents.
Cost per thousand stamps on basis of Bureau's estimate, for printing alone	8.63
Bureau's estimate of cost, including paper, gumming, etc.	5
Difference, over 42 per cent	3.63

In the foregoing comparisons no account has been made of the different estimates of cost of different kinds of stamps, but the cost of the ordinary stamps for the use of the public has been used, as the other kinds of stamps form but about one per cent of the total amount of the contract, and the difference in cost plays no important part.

A fair estimate of the number of stamps which will now be required annually is 3,000,000,000, although this amount is likely to be increased about 3 per cent each year. Under this estimate, if the stamps are furnished by the Bureau, and its estimate of the average cost per thousand printings for the year ending June 30, 1895, is to be relied upon, it will cost the Government to print its stamps $258,900 a year, and this amount will be increased by whatever sum is required to cover the cost of paper, gumming, perforating, packing, distribution, and the other items above enumerated.

CHEAPER TO PROCURE POSTAGE STAMPS BY COMPETITIVE BIDDING THAN FOR THE GOVERNMENT TO MANUFACTURE THEM.

It is no reflection upon the administration of the affairs of the Bureau to claim that it is impossible for it to turn out work at as cheap a cost as can be done by private manufacturers, though the latter reap a profit. It is a notorious and well-recognized fact that the cost of Government work is greater than that of private enterprise, and this in the very nature of things must necessarily be the case. The work is superintended and performed by those who have no personal pecuniary interest in economizing or in taking advantage of improvements, while the private manufacturer, stimulated by competition and the desire for profits, is ever on the alert to invent and make use of new and improved machinery and methods, and to discover ways and means for economizing cost.

Government employés work shorter hours than do those employed by private parties, their pay is higher, and those in the Bureau have thirty days vacation and thirty days sick leave with pay. The result of competition in reducing the cost of production by private concerns can not be better shown than by the reduction in the price of postage stamps from 25 cents per thousand less than thirty years ago to 5.83, the price now bid by the American Bank Note Company, and, although reductions in cost from year to year are shown by the estimates of the Bureau, nothing approaching such a reduction is or can be claimed on its behalf in respect of the work performed by it.

The legitimate work of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was never provided to be performed by it because it could be done by the Government cheaper than it could be procured from private parties. The origin of the Bureau was in the supposed greater security with respect to its currency and bonds if the work of their manufacture were performed by the Treasury Department itself, and it has always been recognized that this desired security was obtained, if at all, at the expense of an increased cost of production. In 1875 a memorial was presented to Congress by the American Bank Note Company, the National Bank Note Company, and the Continental Bank Note Company, then the three largest and most important bank-note concerns in the country, offering to do the entire work of engraving and printing then performed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for $250,000 less than the same was costing the Government. (See Report No. 150, House of Representatives, Forty-third Congress, second session, Committee on Banking and Currency, February 16, 1875, pages 137, 139, 297.)

Upon a hearing before the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General on the 25th day of January, 1894, on the question of accepting the offer of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to perform the stamp contract, counsel for the American Bank Note Company was authorized by it to offer to perform the entire work of the Bureau for 25 to 30 per cent less than the amount expended by the Government therefor.

PRESENT SYSTEM AFFORDS AMPLE SECURITY.

As has been stated above, the reason for the performance by the Government of the work originally intrusted to the Treasury Department and now performed by the Bureau of Engraving was the supposed security afforded thereby, and the Secretary of the Treasury now asks to make the postage stamps upon the plea of safety and security.

There is nothing in the past history of the performance of the contracts for the supply of stamps by private contractors to justify such a plea. Not only have these contracts been performed with entire satisfaction to the Post-Office Department and so as to elicit public commendation, but there has never been any loss to the Government therefrom. A system of checks against loss by carelessness or fraud that would be adopted by any responsible private contractor would be quite as efficacious as any employed by the Bureau, and, indeed, the private contractor can be relied upon to use the utmost efforts to protect itself against such loss, for independently of the heavy penalties of the bonds required it would result in utter ruin to any responsible private concern to have any serious misadventure occur with the postage stamps while in its custody.

But if any misadventure should occur the Government is amply protected by the bond of the private contractor, while if the work is done by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing any loss must be borne by the Government itself; so that there is, in reality, greater security in the performance of the work by private contract.

For the reasons above stated it is insisted that the furtherance of the public interests and justice to the interests of private enterprise require that Congress should refuse to sanction the proposed action of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing with respect to the manufacture of postage stamps, which is not only without the authority but is in direct violation of the provisions of existing law.

APPENDIX.

[Extracts from CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing debates on subject of proposed manufacture of postage stamps by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department.]

In the Committee of the Whole of the House of Representatives, January 29, 1879, the Post-Office appropriation bill being under consideration (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-fifth Congress, third session, volume 33, pages 820, 821).

* * * * * * *

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill and read the following:

Office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General: For manufacture of adhesive postage stamps, of official stamps, and of newspaper and periodical stamps, $92,000.

Mr. LATHROP. I move to amend the paragraph just read by the Clerk, by adding to it that which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"If said stamps can be furnished by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department at less than the same now cost, the work of printing the same shall be given to said Bureau when not in violation of existing contract."

Mr. BLOUNT (in charge of the bill). I raise the point of order on that amendment, that it is a change of existing law.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Oregon. It proposes to reduce expenditure.

Mr. BLOUNT. It does not appear that it retrenches expenditures.

Mr. LATHROP. My proposition is to give this work to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing only when so doing will save money to the Government. If that is not in the direction of economy, I would like to know what is.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. COX in the chair). The Chair is unable to determine by the amendment whether it would save money or not.

Mr. BAKER of Indiana. The very words of the amendment will show that.

Mr. BLOUNT. The amendment may be unobjectionable, but we have no information from the Department on the subject; and I must insist upon my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will not rule the amendment out of order; there may be economy in it.

The question was taken on the amendment; and it was agreed to.

The clerk read as follows:

"For the manufacture of postal cards, $200,000."

Mr. LATHROP. I offer another amendment of the same character as the one just adopted. I move to insert at the end of the clause just read the following:

"If such postal cards can be produced and furnished by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department at less than the same now cost, the work shall be given to said Bureau when not in violation of existing contracts."

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. Before this amendment is voted upon I wish to submit a single suggestion. I intended to say something upon a similar amendment touching stamps, but the vote was taken before I could get an opportunity. These amendments provide that the work shall be given to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing if it can be done by that Bureau at "less than the same now cost." Now, take the item of stamps under the contract prior to the present one.

Mr. BLOUNT. Can the gentleman state when the present contract will expire?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I think in about a year; I am not sure as to that, however. Under the former contract for stamps, as I now recollect, the compensation paid for furnishing them was 14 cents a thousand. It is now a little less than 10 cents a thousand. What the contract is for postal cards I can not just now state; but no doubt, as in the case of stamps, it is much less than the price under the former contract. Now, for one, I am not willing to say that when the existing contract expires the Government shall not invite competition for a new contract, provided the Bureau of Engraving and Printing will do the work for a shade less than the price now paid. I think it very likely that upon proposals for a new contract, the stamps may be printed and the postal cards manufactured at less than the present rate. I am not willing, therefore, to tie the hands of the Department by the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. BLOUNT. I would like to ask the gentleman whether he considers that the hands of the Department would be tied by the proposition?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. As I understand you can not by the amendment interfere with any contract now in existence; but when the existing contract expires, if the Bureau of Engraving and Printing will do the work for a thousandth part of a cent less than is now paid by contract, the Department will be prohibited from having the work done even at a cheaper price by an outside party upon a new contract.

Mr. FINLEY. How are we to know that the Bureau of Engraving and Printing can not do the work for less? How is that to be ascertained?

Mr. CANNON of Illinois. I accept the gentleman's question as an argument against the amendment. I think it is a very pertinent one.

The amendment was not agreed to.

In the Senate of the United States, February 20, 1879. The Post-Office appropriation bill being under consideration (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-fifth Congress, third session, volume 8, page 1067).

Mr. PADDOCK. On page 8, after line 167, I move to insert:

"And the work shall be awarded to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing if it shall appear that the same can be done in said Bureau and delivered at the Post-Office Department at a less cost than if done elsewhere."

So as to make the proviso read:

"That in all propositions for contracts hereafter made for said stamps, bids from the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department shall be received and acted upon on the same basis as the bids of other parties; and the work shall be awarded to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing if it shall appear that the same can be done in said Bureau and delivered at the Post-Office Department at a less cost than if done elsewhere."

Mr. DORSEY. I think there is no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

In the House of Representatives, January 25, 1881 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-sixth Congress, third session, pages 924 and 925), the Post-Office appropriation bill being under consideration by the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Office of the Third Assistant Postmaster-General: For manufacture of adhesive postage stamps, of official stamps, and of newspaper and periodical stamps, $105,500: Provided, That the condition attached to the item of appropriation for the 'manufacture of adhesive postage stamps,' etc., in the first section of the 'act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, and for other purposes,' approved March 3, 1879, which condition is in the following words, namely, 'If said stamps can be furnished by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department at less than the same now cost, the work of printing the same shall be given to said Bureau when not in violation of existing contracts,' be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

Mr. HUNTON. I move to strike out the proviso of the paragraph beginning in line 104 and terminating at the end of the paragraph. My purpose in moving this amendment is to obtain an understanding of what is designed by the proviso. According to its language it would appear that the effect would be to exclude the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department from obtaining this work, even though it should be the lowest bidder. It does seem to me that if the Government can do this work more cheaply than it can have it done, the work ought to be done by the Government. If the Bureau of Engraving and Printing can do the work at less than would be paid for it done elsewhere, then I think that Bureau ought to have an opportunity to bid for it. But I make the motion merely for the purpose of obtaining an explanation of the proviso.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON], let me say that the condition attached to a former Post-Office appropriation bill which this proviso seeks to repeal was never (as shown by the Journal and the RECORD) passed a law at all; it never had the sanction of either House of Congress. When that appropriation bill went to the enrolling clerk for enrollment the proviso or condition which we seek here to repeal was not in it. While it stands in the statutes, it was never agreed to by either House of Congress. I will say, further, that it never ought to have been agreed to by either House, for it had not the effect of permitting the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to come in as an equal bidder for the making of these adhesive stamps; but its effect was to exclude all other competitive bidders, and simply require the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to bid against existing rates.

Now I take it that the gentleman from Virginia does not want to sanction such a thing as that. I take it that no gentleman wants to give an exclusive privilege like that to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. It already has advantages enough. If it comes in as a bidder upon the same terms with the competitive bidders of the country, it still has advantages over each and all of them. It has its rent all free: it has its gas and fuel free. The Government furnishes all these, which other bidders must supply for themselves. There are advantages enough to be enjoyed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. The Committee on Appropriations by inserting this proviso means simply to repeal a condition in a former bill which permitted the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to be the only bidder, provided it would undertake to do the work at less than 10 cents per thousand, which, in round numbers, is the present rate. That, I hold, nobody wants to sanction.

More than that, if I had the power I would not permit the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to compete at all for this work. Even if it should be the lowest bidder, who is to be responsible for the deficit if the Bureau should bid too low to make the work remunerative? The Government of the United States is responsible; this Bureau can not lose a dollar. It might undertake to do the work at 5 cents a thousand and lose 3 cents on every thousand, yet the Government itself would be the loser. There is no responsible party to insure that the work shall be done at the bid of the Bureau without loss to the Government. I repeat: All that this proviso does is to repeal a provision in the former bill, which condition was never agreed to by either House of Congress. It crept in by mistake; it has worked so inequitably and unfairly as to shut out all competitive bidding throughout the country and give the contract to the Bureau of Edgraving and Printing, provided it would bid lower than existing rates. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia will not be adopted, and that the proviso in the bill will remain.

Mr. HUNTON. I know nothing of the manner in which this original provision was adopted. It is a law of the land, and this proviso seeks to repeal it. But I desire to put to my friend from Kentucky this question: If the proviso in this paragraph should be retained, can the Bureau of Engraving and Printing be a competitor for the printing of these adhesive stamps?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia my construction of the law would be——

Mr. HUNTON. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. BLACKBURN. What is it that the gentleman wants? Does he want me to give him some other man's opinion? I think that the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, under the operation of this proviso, stands exactly upon an equality with other competitive bidders of the country, save and except that the Government furnishes its rent, its fuel, and its light free.

Mr. HUNTON. If this proviso be retained, can the Bureau come in as a competitor for this work?

Mr. BLACKBURN. I should say that it could, but I hope it would not.

Mr. HUNTON. I hope it would; and believing that it would, I withdraw the amendment.

The Senate of the United States, February 23, 1885, the Post-Office appropriation bill being under consideration (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-eighth Congress, second session, pages 2007 to 2012):

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, in section 1, to strike out the following clause, from line 139 to line 151, inclusive:

"That at the future lettings of contracts for the manufacture of postage stamps, stamped envelopes, postal cards, and other postal securities the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required to submit bids for the manufacture of said stamps, stamped envelopes, postal cards, and other postal securities, by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department, which bids shall be considered in competition with bids from private parties: But provided, That the Postmaster-General may reject any and all the bids of private parties, and award the contracts, or any of them, upon the bid of the Secretary of the Treasury, if in his judgment it shall be for the best interests of the Government to do so."

* * * * * * *

Mr. PLUMB. The committee recommended the striking out of this provision for two reasons: In the first place, because it is legislation, and in the next place, because, as they believe, it is bad legislation. I hope every Senator will take the bill and read this provision now in order to understand fully its scope. I will read it:

"That all the future lettings of contracts for the manufacture of postage stamps, stamped envelopes, postal cards, and other postal securities"—

I hope the Senate will note the full scope of the provision. It not only refers to the manufacture of postage stamps, but of stamped envelopes, postal cards, and other postal securities—

"the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required to submit bids for the manufacture of said stamps, stamped envelopes, postal cards, and other postal securities by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing of the Treasury Department, which bids shall be considered in competition with bids from private parties: But provided, That the Postmaster-General may reject any or all the bids of private parties, and award the contracts, or any of them, upon the bid of the Secretary of the Treasury, if, in his judgment, it shall be for the best interests of the Government to do so."

It will be observed that that is a very peculiar provision. In the first place it would permit the Government, if a contract was awarded for the manufacture of envelopes, not to the mere printing of a stamp upon them, but to the manufacture of the envelope and the manufacture of postal cards and of every other form of postal security as well as postage stamps. In addition to that it requires that the Secretary of the Treasury shall make a bid, not stating the cost to the Government of doing this work, but he shall make such bid as he sees fit, and after he has made the bid the Postmaster-General, without considering the question of the relative cost to the Government under the bids of the Secretary of the Treasury and under bids of private parties, may, if in his judgment he thinks it best, without reference to the question of cost at all, or considering that also, if he pleases, give the bid to the Secretary of the Treasury instead of to private parties.

In other words, the Postmaster-General is to pass upon the general questions of public policy as to whether he thinks it is a good idea for the Government to erect paper mills and enter on the manufacture of envelopes. There is not to be found so wide a discretion in the statute book conferred on any executive officer; but, Mr. President, it is obnoxious even if it were guarded on that point. In the first place, there is practically no way of telling exactly what the cost of any article is that is manufactured at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. We can tell the gross cost of all the work done there, but no estimate can properly be made by the head of that Bureau or by anybody else which will state to a fraction the cost of doing any part of that work, because all the elements can not be separated.

The elements of cost on account of the use of capital, the wear and tear of machinery engaged in the manufacture of a particular thing covering a brief period of time, can not be told: and even if it could be told there is no guaranty that it will be told in a bid of this kind. The Secretary of the Treasury might inadvertently or designedly bid one-half the price that private parties would bid for this work and the Government would not be the gainer thereby, because that one-half the cost would have to be made up by appropriations which would nominally go into the expense of printing other securities of the Government that that Bureau is engaged in printing now.

Mr. President, I think I speak for the entire committee when I say that not a single member of it believed, in the absence of any allegation, that we were paying too much for the postal securities we are getting now. In the absence of any allegation that we are paying too much for stamped envelopes, which are being furnished the Government now, is it wise for the Government to enter upon this experiment under any circumstances whatever? I believe I may go further and say that the committee is unanimously of the opinion that the Government ought not to undertake the manufacture of this or any other thing where private capital and private skill are willing and able to do a good job, at a fair price. I do not see any reason why the Government should manufacture paper in competition with private capital carrying on that same business, and neither did any other member of the committee, and so, for all these reasons, any one of which is conclusive to my mind, the committee reported in favor of striking out the provision.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope the Senate will give some attention to the provision, because I regard it as one of considerable importance. I am heartily in favor of striking it out. In the first place, upon the ground of general policy, it is not well for the Federal Government to enlarge its already vast number of employés—of workmen alone, I mean. The necessary enlargement due to the growth of the country is quite sufficient. The proposition is here to let the Government be a bidder against private manufacturers in a matter which private manufacturers understand perfectly well, and in which there is no difficulty whatever.

* * * * * * *

The Government officers in making this bid will take no account of rent, and yet there will be really a charge against this work of rent or should be. They will find it necessary to enlarge their public buildings in order to do it. The officers of the Treasury in making a bid will take no account of insurance. The Government is its own insurer. It will take no account of taxes; it will take no account of the depreciation of machinery, which is 10 per cent a year upon a very costly set of machinery. It will take no account of the percentage of the compensation of supervising officers that ought to be charged to the envelope agency. The Government can not be holden to any particular sum if it bids to do the work at certain rate, because it must go on and finish the work whether it costs twice that or not. There is nobody to sue upon a bond; nobody to keep within certain fixed limits.

Mr. DAWES. I have always understood it to be considered a matter of regret that we were under the necessity of maintaining such a vast establishment as the Printing Office, but the considerations that enter into the maintenance of that are such that it can not be obviated, and it is a necessity to carry on that vast establishment because of the nature of the work. But none of those considerations enter into this matter. The stamped envelopes, the postal cards, and the stamps themselves that are made separately can be, so far as convenience, or necessity, or use is concerned, made at one place as well as another. It is only a question of cost. Now, the Government does not save at all, because it does not charge to the cost of the manufacture of an envelope the cost of the plant, or the interest on the plant, or the insurance, or anything like that. It does not save that because it pays it in another way; it all comes out of the Treasury although it is not charged off against the cost of each envelope; so while the Government by thus disregarding what must in the end come out of the Treasury, as an element of cost, can put upon the market envelopes so much cheaper than the private person can that they at once must take the whole business and must, as I have said, gather all this plant.

* * * But I wish to know what the last clause in the paragraph means if it does not mean that you offer to the public an invitation to bid for the doing of this work, and you invite them to put themselves down to the lowest possible point, and to accommodate their machinery, their capital, and their investment to it, and when it is done we will do as we have a mind to; we will crush you out entirely and go into the manufacture of private production along with you.

* * * * * * *

It seems to me that when you embark in the manufacture of all these postal cards and envelopes and work of that kind you might just as well set up a woolen mill, a hatter's shop, a shoemaker's shop, and turn the city of Washington into a grand center of manufacturing of which the Government will furnish the capital and the Government will furnish the employés.

* * * * * * *

Mr. PLUMB. It is not cognate to that of the public printing generally, because there, after great experience, Congress determined that it would be practicable to always have on hand the facilities to do this work and not to submit to the general scuffle of bidding; but in this case there has been no complaint anywhere either of the quality of the work or the price at which it was done. Private parties have not only been ready and willing to do this work, as they have been to carry the mails, and do other things, at a reasonable price, but there have been built up great establishments which the Government would now practically break up if it were to enter upon the matter in this way.

I do not mean to say that necessarily it would result in that being done by the Government, but by the dangerous power vested in the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster-General by this section. It does not limit them to accepting the lowest bid or the best bid, but simply says to the Postmaster-General, "If you think on the whole, without reference to what private parties may have bid, that the Government ought to enter upon this manufacture as a public policy, then you can give the bid to the Secretary of the Treasury and reject those of all the private parties."

* * * * * * *

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, I did not examine this question with very great care because it impressed me in committee, as I believe it did the whole committee, that the work was being done pretty cheaply now. We heard of no combinations. It seems there was fair competiton and very open competition in regard to all these matters, and it was thought we should not undertake it, especially under the latter clause of the paragraph which provides that the Postmaster-General may reject any or all bids of private parties and award the contracts, or any of them, upon the bid of the Secretary of the Treasury if, in his judgment, it shall be for the best interests of the Government to do so. That would be giving a power to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the Postmaster-General to increase the employés of this Government almost ad infinitum.

My experience has been that nothing is ever as cheaply done when it is administrative as when it is done by competition as a commercial transaction. The Government never does carry on anything as cheaply as private people can do it.

The committee were advised further, and I believe it will turn out to be so, that before a plant sufficient can be put down to start this business, a building twice as large as that of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing will have to be built, and five or six hundred, perhaps a thousand, employés will have to come in. I, for one, believe that no greater calamity can happen to poor people that to tempt them to come here to work for the Government under influences that may change every two or three years, and to be dependent upon patronage and upon the power of political men or political parties. Whenever work can be done otherwise, I want to see it done.

You must recollect that in any private establishment making stamps the cost of the building is a very great item, and the cost of the machinery is a great item. All these things enter into the calculation in that case; but when you merely compare the pay of the employés and give the building for nothing, give the machinery for nothing, the fuel and all the other things, with no rent charged, perhaps the comparison may be in favor of the Government. I am not so sure in regard to that. However, I know the fact, and we all know it, that we ought not, unless we are compelled by self-protection, to drive out the competition of our citizens by having Government employés here to convert such business into administration.

There is enough of administration, there is enough of embarrassament, and there are enough people drawn here, who, according to my experience, become more and more dependent, less and less self-reliant, less and less useful citizens the longer they stay here, dependent, as many of them are, upon the changes of the wheel of fortune in politics. We ought not to encourage any great increase of those classes of people if we can help it; and we can keep a very large number away by allowing this competition to go on in the manufacture of envelopes, which has been done satisfactorily before, and I think it will be done satisfactorily again.

The last clause of the paragraph, I say, alarmed me more than any other provision in it. I do not want the Postmaster-General or the Secretary of the Treasury, I do not care whether he is a Democrat or a Republican, to have the right to disregard bids and say what shall be abolished. At any rate I was in favor of striking it out after all the information we had, so that we may hear from the House as to why it was put in, and that our conferees may hear in regard to it; whereas if we agree to retain the clause now we shall hear nothing and it will have passed out of our hands altogether. * * *

Mr. PLUMB. It ought to be stated here as a fact, as it is, that this work has been done for the Government at a lower price every year, showing that competition has its full effect in this as it has in ordinary branches of business. If the statement with which the Senator from Alabama concluded his speech is to apply, then the Government ought to have horses and wagons so that in cases where it should be necessary to enlarge the star-route service it may supply from headquarters at Washington or elsewhere, the mail service with the necessary machinery to carry it on.

If we can not rely upon private competition, let us carry it out to the logical conclusion; let the Government have all these things on hand and a plant ready to carry on the manufacture not only in regard to mail matter, but, as the Senator from Kentucky says, the clothing for the Army, and things of that sort, if private parties do not meet its expectations.

* * * * * * *

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HARRIS in the Chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted, yeas, 32; nays 20.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of patience to the gentleman who has just presented some remarks which I presume to be an argument on behalf of the bank-note companies of the United States to retain this printing under their control, which as I am informed is profitable to the extent of perhaps $40,000 or $50,000 per year, rather than have it transferred to a Department of the Government where it can be done, according to the proposition already made by that Department, for many thousands of dollars less than it has been done heretofore, or is offered to be done for at the present time.

The Bureau of Engraving and Printing had its origin in the fact that the Government was imposed upon by the bank-note companies of the United States. In 1861 or 1862, Mr. Chase, then Secretary of the Treasury, with but two bank-note companies in the United States, found that they were the only bidders in the market for the execution of the work of printing the securities and obligations of the Government, and Mr. Chase came before the Congress of the United States and asked authority that the printing be done in the Treasury Department. There it was done, and most of the bonds and obligations of the Government were printed under the roof of the present Treasury building. Eighteen or twenty years ago, prosecuting that idea still further, the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was established, and a handsome building was constructed in which to do this work.

But by the adroit management of the bank-note companies of this country, when the matter was brought before Congress from time to time, by people who had the interests of the country at heart, they have always succeeded in defeating the proposition that the Government should do its own printing, and have kept it in the hands of these contractors in the city of New York who, I think, always understand when they have a good thing and are anxious to retain it.

This Bureau of Engraving and Printing comes here, represented by a competent man, the Chief of the Bureau, who says that the Department can do the printing for $40,000 a year less than it has been done in the city of New York, and he says that in the interest of economy it ought to be done in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

My understanding is that an expenditure of $20,000 or $25,000 will furnish the necessary presses, and that these dies from which the stamps are printed belong to the Government, and the moment the Government concludes to do this printing that these parties must surrender these dies to the Government, and then the printing can be done in its own establishment, and with the best possible checks against fraud. This is now done with all our internal-revenue stamps, our money, and other securities, under a system which is certain to protect the Government against fraud.

Now, our postage stamps are printed in the city of New York. They never pass through the Post-Office Department in the city of Washington, but we send an agent to New York, and these stamps are distributed from that point, and sent to the different points in the United States where they are needed, under the auspices of this agent, without passing under the scrutiny of the Department here.

This is a plain sort of work, more easily done than bank notes; and why should not the Government save this money? There is nothing to exclude the labor unions from having their men in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, where as good wages are paid as by outside parties; and if a profit is to be made on this job let the Government make the profit in the interest of economy, which the Democratic party is pledged to. [Applause.]

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. In view of the fact that it is getting near 5 o'clock, when we will have to take a recess, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 6016), had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess as if at 5 o'clock, until 8 o'clock this evening.

The SPEAKER. One moment. The Chair will lay before the House several personal requests.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HICKS, for the rest of the week, on account of important business.

To Mr. OATES, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. COBB of Alabama, from attendance at this evening's session.

TAXATION OF UNITED STATES LEGAL-TENDER NOTES, ETC.

Mr. HENDERSON of Illinois, by unanimous consent, submitted the views of the minority on the bill proposing the taxation of the United States legal-tender notes for State, Territorial, and municipal purposes; which were ordered to be printed with the views of the majority.

REPRINT OF BILLS.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. MAGUIRE, the bills H. R. 5501, 5502, 5503, 5504, 5505, 5506, and 5803 were ordered to be reprinted, the original editions being exhausted.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the House now take a recess instead of waiting until 5 o'clock, the evening session to be devoted to the consideration of bills under the rules. Without objection, that order will be made, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROOKSHIRE] will perform the duties of the Chair at the evening session.

There was no objection.

And accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House was declared in recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 8 o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. BROOKSHIRE, as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read clause 3 of Rule XXVI.

The Clerk read as follows:

3. The House shall, on each Friday, at 5 o'clock p. m., take a recess until 8 o'clock, which evening session shall be devoted to the consideration of private bills reported from the Committee on Pensions and the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to bills for the removal of political disabilities, and bills removing charges of desertion only; said evening session not to extend beyond 10 o'clock and 30 minutes.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, under the rule just read.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole Mr. DOCKERY in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar, and the Clerk will report the first bill.

CORNELIA DE PEYSTER BLACK.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3156) granting a pension to Cornelia De Peyster Black, widow of Henry M. Black, late colonel United States Army, deceased.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent, at the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE], that that bill be passed over without prejudice to-night.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

CALEB HUSE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5735) a bill to remove the political disabilities of Caleb Huse.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, two-thirds of the Senate and the House of Representatives concurring therein, all political disabilities imposed upon and incurred by Caleb Huse, formerly of the State of Alabama and now of the State of New York, by virtue of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution, be, and are hereby, removed.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, this bill will be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. JONES. I would like to have the report read.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. The report was read Friday night two weeks ago.

Mr. JONES. I would like to ask the gentleman whether the removal of the disabilities in this case is to enable the party to get a pension, or something of that nature?

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. No; I can assure the gentleman that no such purpose is sought to be accomplished. This gentleman was a graduate of West Point, and was the assistant professor of chemistry at the Military Academy until 1859. He then resigned from the Army and went to Alabama, where he was made the superintendent of the military school at Tuscaloosa. He afterwards became an officer in the Confederate army, and he now requests that his political disabilities be removed. This is one of the few cases remaining unacted upon. The applicant is a cultivated and distinguished educator. There is a petition here for the removal of the disabilities. I trust that no objection will be interposed to the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

ELIZA HOLMES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1717) granting a pension to Eliza Holmes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of Eliza Holmes, widow of John Holmes, deceased, late of Company A, Seventy-ninth Regiment New York Volunteers, and whose pension claim is numbered 13513.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I ask for the reading of the report.

The report by (Mr. HAINES) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions have considered the bill (H. R. 1717) granting a pension to Eliza Holmes, and submit the following report:

The petitioner, whose address is No. 343 West Seventeenth street, New York City, is the widow of John Holmes, deceased, late a member of Company A, Seventy-ninth New York Volunteers, to whom she was married September 22, 1860, as shown by the affidavit of the officiating clergyman and other evidence; the fact that she has remained a widow since the soldier's death is also established by satisfactory testimony.

The records of the War Department show that John Holmes enlisted in Company A, Seventy-ninth New York Volunteers, May 13, 1861, and was "found dead in High street, Georgetown, D. C., on the morning of July 2, 1861; deceased had been stabbed by some person or persons unknown."

In an affidavit dated July 20, 1804, William Manson (since deceased), who was captain of soldier's company, testifies that when the regiment left Georgetown, about July 1, 1861, a portion of the regiment was left behind to guard the regiment property; that said Holmes was one of such guard and was on the following day found dead, having been stabbed during the night by some person unknown, and that he was in the performance of his duty at the time of his death.

John H. Sheppard, in affidavit executed September 24, 1885, testifies that he was a comrade of John Holmes, and that they together were placed on guard duty at the observatory in Georgetown on the morning of July 2, 1861 (probably meaning, however, July 1), and continued on that duty until 8:30 p. m., when they returned to the college and found that the regiment had moved, leaving a guard consisting of Lieut. McNee and about 12 men; the officer told them there was no food for them and gave them permission to go and get something; they went to a grocery store and got some cheese and crackers; while there three men, apparently civilians, used some abusive language toward them, which they did not resent, but left. Holmes, however, decided to go back alone to get something more, and was never seen again alive; next morning affiant learned that Holmes was murdered; he was perfectly sober when he left affiant.

The Georgetown Evening Star of July 2, 1861, contained the following account of the murder:

"John Holmes, a private in Company A, Seventy-ninth New York Regiment, was murdered this morning at an early hour near the corner of High and West streets. He received two stabs in the left breast. * * * The coroner's inquest is now in progress, and the evidence of those in the neighborhood shows that deceased was in an altercation with one or two other men, habited in the uniform of his regiment, and from them received the wound that caused his death. * * * Several members of the regiment were arrested, and one is strongly suspected."

The War Department records do not, however, show that any member of the regiment was under arrest for this murder or anything further in the matter.

The widow's claim was rejected on the ground that the soldier's death did not occur in the line of duty, and she can not be pensioned under the act of June 27, 1890, for the reason that the soldier was not honorably discharged from the service.

While the action of the Pension Bureau is doubtless proper, this seems to be just such a case as special acts of Congress are designed to relieve. While it can not be proved that the soldier met his death in line of duty, it is equally true that he died in service and that there is no sufficient reason to assume that it was through any fault of his own that he was murdered.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is not a bill that ought to be favorably reported by this committee. The report itself admits that there is no evidence to show that this soldier died in line of duty. This ex parte evidence, I take it, goes to show that he died in the service. I do not agree with the committee as to the evidence. It seems to me that it is very clear that this man was killed in some brawl in Georgetown. He had been to a store with a number of his companions and they had some difficulty, according to the affidavit of one of his comrades, and they left.

The soldier for whose widow a pension is asked returned to the store, and that was the last that was ever seen of him alive. Now, this was a grocery store. I do not know whether they were "dry" groceries or "wet" groceries that were sold there, but I am inclined to think they were "wet" groceries; and I am further inclined to think that the soldier's death was brought about by his own misconduct while at this place. There is no evidence to the contrary here; and I do not think we have a right to presume anything to the contrary. I shall certainly object, for one, to the passage of this bill under these circumstances.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the pension cases, out of a great number that I have been requested to introduce, which seems to me to be of unquestioned merit.

This is a case where a young man and woman were married in the autumn of 1860. In the spring of 1861 the man enlisted, leaving his wife and going into the Union Army. His record is a perfectly clear and straight one. He accompanied his regiment to the field of operations. It was stationed at Georgetown. He was assigned to guard duty. The circumstances were such that before he returned to his company the company had moved on. He was given special permission by his superior officer to go and get something to eat. All else that is known in regard to that man is that, entirely sober, with the permission of his officer, he, after one of his comrades had been rebuffed at the grocery store to which they had applied for provisions, returned in the hope of securing what was necessary, and was found dead next morning in the streets of Georgetown with two stabs in his body.

The only evidence, the only suggestion, that he was engaged in any altercation is in a newspaper paragraph which carries in the body of it the proof of its own erroneous character. Being a local paper of Georgetown, naturally endeavoring—for we all know the state of feeling there at that time—to throw upon the soldiers there stationed the responsibility for anything out of the way that may have occurred, this paper stated that the soldier's comrades were under arrest for having caused his death. An inspection of the records of the War Department show that no man was arrested on that charge. That was a definite statement for which the paper was responsible, which it had opportunity to know the truth of; and, therefore, if that statement is effectually discredited, as it is, there can be no reliance placed upon the remainder of the article.

As to the suggestion of my friend from Virginia [Mr. JONES] that the poor hungry soldier went for "wet" groceries instead of dry ones; that he may be presumed to have engaged in an altercation when he alone was left, or he and his comrades were left, away from their company amid a hostile population, I think I can leave that to the gentleman himself, and that even he will not claim that any such lame assumption is any reason why this man's widow should not be recognized by Government as the widow of one who died in the line of duty.

Now, I have no fault to find with the Pension Office. The entire record has been put before us by that office. It was left with the committee and the bill has worked out its own salvation. In the proceedings of the Pension Office there was not, from beginning to end, even a suggestion of a doubt but that the circumstances narrated in the report of the committee were all that could be produced, and I respectfully submit, sir, that if there ever was a case which came within the spirit of the pension laws, but which, on account of its not coming within the letter of them, it was proper to bring before Congress instead of before the Pension Bureau, it is this case.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from Virginia has objected to the consideration of this bill. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York if it is not true that under the present law, had this widow's husband been killed after having obtained an honorable discharge, she could have obtained a pension under the act of June 29, 1890?

Mr. WARNER. That is the case; and it is the case that if this poor man had survived two days and had been sent home because he was not able to go on in the service, his widow would have been entitled to a pension.

Mr. TAWNEY. Then the fact that he was killed in the service is the only reason why his widow can not obtain a pension under the law?

Mr. WARNER. That is the only reason. She does not come within the precedents established by the old law, and she does no come within the letter of the law of 1890.

Mr. HULICK. Did this soldier go to that grocery store to purchase provisions, or to get them as soldiers are sometimes compelled to get them, without purchase?

Mr. WARNER. The evidence is that, upon finding that the company had moved on, their officer gave these men permission to go and get some crackers: suggested it, in fact. They went to the store to procure some crackers.

Mr. HULICK. To purchase them?

Mr. WARNER. To purchase them. There is no suggestion to the contrary even in the imagination of the reporter of this Georgetown newspaper.

Mr. HULICK. There was no attempt to take them by force?

Mr. WARNER. Not the slightest. I may add that this case has been investigated repeatedly. All the facts that have been discovered are set out in the report. Further, I may say that in the report transmitted from the Pension Office there is no suggestion of any reason why this pension should not be granted, except the doubt as to whether it was not more properly a case to be provided for here instead of there.

Mr. HULICK. Oh, this case is all right.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I differ from the gentleman from New York [Mr. WARNER] as to the credit that ought to be attached to the evidence in this case. I have just obtained a copy of this report. It is very difficult to take in the whole purport of a report when it is read hastily from the Clerk's desk; but I have glanced over this report during the last few minutes and I find that the pension claim in this case is based upon the statements contained in two affidavits and a newspaper clipping. Now, the affidavits do not agree with each other, nor do they agree with the account given of the altercation in which the soldier lost his life, in the newspaper clipping. One of these affidavits is made in 1864, the other twenty-one years thereafter, in 1885.

The first affidavit states that this soldier was one of a body of soldiers left to guard property in Georgetown. The affidavit of the comrade, made nearly a quarter of a century after the soldier's death, does not make any such statement, but says that he came into camp and found an officer and twelve men there detailed to take care of this property. This affidavit says that the officer in charge told these men to go to a grocery and get some crackers and cheese; that they went there and that there was an altercation between them and some civilians. The exact language employed in the report is:

> Three men, apparently civilians, used some abusive language toward them which they did not resent, but left. Holmes, however, decided to go back alone to get something more.

The report does not state what that "something more" was, but I think the presumption is very clear as to what it was. The man was never seen again alive.

Now, the newspaper clipping also states that there was an altercation; but it was not between the soldier and civilians, but, according to the newspaper account, he was killed in a broil with his own comrades. "That the deceased was in an altercation with one or two other men habited in the uniform of his regiment," is the language of the newspaper account.

Now, I prefer to take this newspaper account, which was given the very morning after this man was found dead, rather than take the affidavit of this comrade given twenty-two or twenty-three years afterwards. And I think it is clear, from this newspaper clipping, that this man was not only killed in an altercation with soldiers of his own regiment, but while he was on a drunken spree.

I think that a claim of this kind ought not to be favorably reported upon bare presumptions drawn from loose and contradictory affidavits. This evidence would not be received in any court of law. Remember that at best these are mere affidavits which state it may be fairly presumed everything that could be regarded as favorable toward obtaining a pension, whilst everything that would hurt the case is carefully omitted. The man making the affidavit was not asked, it may be supposed, to state anything more than what is here given: he was probably told by the party desiring the affidavit, "This is the only fact I want you to state," so that he testified to nothing else.

It seems to me that no lawyer would accept this testimony as worth anything anywhere. It is self-contradictory; and it is in the form of mere ex parte affidavits and newspaper articles. I do not think that an affidavit taken after a lapse of twenty-one years, and as unsatisfactory as this one is, ought to be accepted by this committee as sufficient to justify us in putting this woman on the pension roll.

Mr. PICKLER. The gentleman, of course, admits that if this man had been discharged, his widow would have been entitled to a pension at the Pension Office. Now, instead of being discharged he was killed while in the service; and I submit he was killed in the line of duty. Now, I submit it would be a very technical lawyer who would decline to recognize the equities of this case and to allow this man a pension.

Mr. JONES. If the testimony in this case were in a form to be relied upon, the case might be different. The proof here is no proof at all; the facts are mere presumptions. This kind of testimony ought not to be worth much here, and would not be worth anything in a court of law.

Mr. PICKLER. But it seems to me that is met by the proposition that if the man had been discharged from the service and then killed in any sort of an altercation (as the gentleman assumes was the case) the widow would have received her pension.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is proceeding upon the assumption that this man was killed in the line of duty——

Mr. PICKLER. No.

Mr. JONES. While the report explicitly states that such was not the case.

Mr. PICKLER. If this soldier had been discharged before meeting his death, he might afterwards have been hanged for murder or come to his death in any manner whatever, and his widow would still have been allowed a pension under existing law without coming to Congress for it. I submit there is no evidence to show that this man did not die in the line of duty; and certainly it seems to me very technical to say that his widow should not be allowed a pension. I think the gentleman from Virginia in his cooler moments must acknowledge that such an objection is extremely technical.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. There seems to be some little misunderstanding about one phase of this case. This soldier did not serve ninety days; and the act of June 27, 1890, does not apply to the case at all. In order to obtain a pension under that act there must have been service for ninety days and an honorable discharge.

Now, there is neither an honorable discharge in this case, nor was there ninety days' service. So that I think the act of June 27, 1890, may be entirely eliminated from the consideration of the case. But I do think, Mr. Chairman, that taking all the circumstances in the case, it is not a violent thing for this committee to take this death as one that occurred really in the line of duty. I do not think there is the discrepancy between the two affidavits, to which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] alludes, which he thinks there is. One is the testimony of the captain who went away with the regiment, saying that a portion of the regiment had been left behind on guard. Taking that into consideration with the other affidavit of a comrade, it shows that when the regiment moved away these men were already out on guard. When they were relieved from duty and called back to camp they found the lieutenant in charge of that guard there, guarding Government property.

This was in the early part of the war. This soldier was informed that there was nothing to eat, and this officer having charge and command over this man and over his comrades, informed them of the fact that there was nothing to eat. That was word, coming to a man just relieved from all night or all day duty on guard, finding nothing to eat, to go some place and get something to eat. He went away with his comrade for the purpose of getting something to eat. Now, if the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] had been of an age then to have been one of the comrades on that occasion, and if he had been with John Holmes, I do not think that twenty-two or twenty-three years later a particle of what occurred there that night would have escaped his memory.

This comrade testifies that he was along; that he went to a grocery to obtain something to eat, and that some citizens there had something harsh to say to them. Be it remembered that this was near the very outbreak of the war, the night of the 1st of July, 1861. He says that when they started away this soldier went back, and afterwards he was found murdered. Now the committee, in order that all the evidence should be before the House, have put in this newspaper clipping. We wanted the committee to see all the evidence that we acted upon; and when you take the uncertainty of a newspaper statement, particularly one made in the exciting times that were then common in Georgetown, in Washington, and in fact throughout all this portion of the country, it is no wonder that inaccuracies should creep into the newspaper statements of what occurred there that night, and the means which caused the death of this soldier.

Now, the statement that the soldier was probably in an altercation, and that several members of his regiment had been arrested, and that one was strongly suspected, is, it seems to me, entirely overthrown by the record of the War Department, which shows nothing of that kind to have occurred.

Taking it altogether, just as it is, the newspaper statement, the testimony of the captain, the testimony of the comrade who was with him, it seems to me that there is nothing in the whole case but what would justify the Committee of the Whole and the House of Representatives and Congress, under all the circumstances, in treating this soldier as having died in the line of duty, because he had gone for food which he could not find at quarters when he returned from his guard duty.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, one word more. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN] has answered the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER] much better than I could have done on the question of the law.

Mr. PICKLER. You made no point about the time of the service. You were making a point about the way he died.

Mr. JONES. I supposed that when the gentleman made the assertion he had read the report. I did not suppose he would say that if the soldier had lived two days longer he would have gotten his pension, unless he had some evidence to sustain that statement; and therefore I did not question what he said. But looking at the report. I find that this soldier enlisted May 13, 1861, and was killed on the morning of July 2, 1861, after only about fifty days of service.

Now, the report of the committee of which my friend from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN] is the distinguished chairman, states emphatically that the Pension Department rejected this claim upon the ground that the soldier did not receive his death wound in the line of duty. I assume that the Pension Department, which examined all the testimony and was perfectly familiar with the law relating to the subject, having rejected this claim upon the ground that the soldier was not killed in the line of duty, I can say with a great deal of propriety that this man did not die in the line of duty.

Now, the claim is made upon the testimony of these two soldiers, given twenty-one years apart, and upon a newspaper account of the affair, which was published the very next morning. The newspaper states that several members of the regiment were arrested, and that one of them was strongly suspected of killing this man. That was the account given the very morning after this affair took place. I take it for granted that the newspaper account, given the morning afterward, is more apt to be correct than the statement of this soldier, given twenty-two or twenty-three years after the occurrence; and as I have already said, the soldier probably did not go into all the facts of the case. He was called upon to make this affidavit, and he made it for the purpose of helping this poor woman to get a pension. He stated nothing, I imagine, that would have operated against her.

Now, it is said that the records of the War Department do not show that this soldier came to his death at the hands of his comrades in an altercation with them, and that therefore what is said in the newspaper is not correct. I submit to my friend from New York [Mr. WARNER] that that is entirely negative evidence. It proves nothing at all. The records do not say that anybody was arrested, and therefore we are asked not to believe that anybody was. They simply say nothing about it. They are merely silent, as I understand, upon the subject. I do not think the fact that the records of the War Department are silent upon the subject is testimony to overcome the statement in the newspaper published the next morning.

I do not put the utmost reliance in newspaper statements; but this statement is published as a part of the record, as a part of the evidence upon which the report in this case is founded, and as gentlemen have accepted this as evidence and bring it in here in support of this claim, it does not lie in their mouths to question its correctness. And taking that evidence, as we must if we accept any, it shows conclusively that this man did not die in line of duty. The Commissioner of Pensions rejected the claim upon that ground, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN] has said that if the soldier did not die in line of duty this woman is not entitled to be pensioned.

Mr. LANE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to suggest that this case strikes me as rather meritorious, and I want to suggest some few ideas in connection with the case. I know that a great many cases of this kind have been allowed by the Pension Office, and I am surprised that this woman was not allowed a pension by the Pension Office. I remember several cases where comrades were at play and one of them killed another, and the Pension Office allowed pensions in those cases. They might well take this case and dispose of it in that way. In that line it appears to me unanswerable. There is testimony bearing directly as to how this man came by his death. There is a presumption of law also, when you find a man as they found this man in the morning in the condition he was, that he was killed, that he was murdered.

To sustain the gentleman's contention he must show that this man brought on the altercation himself. There is not a particle of proof of that given here. The soldier had permission to go where he was. Supposing a soldier walks along the street and somebody attacks him, and in self-defense he assaults him and the party who assaulted the soldier absolutely kills him. Was he not in line of duty when he was defending himself? He is just as much in line of duty as if he were in battle when he defended himself. When this assault occurred he was in line of duty, just as much as if he were engaged in a battle. Who brought on this altercation? There is no testimony to show who brought it on. The other party may have brought it on, and this man was killed in self-defense. This soldier defended himself, but the next morning he was found dead.

Now, under these circumstances the presumption of law is that he was murdered; and if he had the permission of his superior officer to be where he was, he was in the line of duty, and this claim could be admitted properly at the Pension Office. But they having refused to do so, we have the power, in the same line, to allow this claim; and it seems to me that all the presumptions are in favor of the soldier, as they ought to be, and the claim ought to be allowed.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, as to the ruling of the Pension Office, I find no fault with that. It is true that had he been engaged in an athletic game with his comrades and suddenly fallen dead, he would have been considered as having died in line of duty. It is true that had he dropped dead at the commissary's office, to which he had been sent for the very rations he was sent to this very place in Georgetown for, he would have been considered as having died in line of duty. So far as I know, however, I believe that the Pension Office has acted right in making a ruling to accept nothing as death in line of duty until it has ascertained precisely what the circumstances of that death were.

Now, sir, that may be right or it may be wrong, but I am inclined to think that as we in this House can right the action of the Pension Office wherever the spirit of the law requires it, the Pension Office is right in holding very strictly to the strict letter of the law.

Now, as to the nature of this evidence. The gentleman from Virginia appears to forget that even if this man was slain by his own comrades—as, however, is not shown—it is none the less death in line of duty for the soldier, for which, unless he is shown to have brought it upon himself by his own crime, he is not responsible.

Now, sir, we all know the condition of things existing in this district at that time. Here is a soldier with a few comrades, separated from their company in an essentially and thoroughly hostile community. He is found murdered when the morning light enables his form to be discovered. The local paper—what would it do in every case? What did it do here? It stated, not what the editor knew, not what he could have ascertained the truth in regard to, but a report that there was an altercation in which members of the soldier's own regiment, or men wearing the uniform, were engaged.

That statement, sir, is an improbable one on its face; but it would naturally be the very first statement that would be made on behalf of the populace, who would naturally be afraid of vengeance being exacted from the community in which the soldier had been killed. Then the paper adds a statement, the truth of which it might have ascertained, that a number of his comrades had been arrested for causing his death; but upon examination that alleged fact is found not to exist. Now, the youth of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES] (he being, I suppose, not older than myself) excuses his not knowing that in the Union Army, at least the records were so complete as to the disciplinary record of every soldier in the service, that if any one of that man's comrades had been arrested at that time the fact would be found on record at the War Department to-day.

Now, sir, as to the length of service of this man; he did not serve throughtout the war, but I trust the gentleman from Virginia will accept his death as an excuse for that. [Laughter.] It is true, also, that Col. Ellsworth did not serve throughout the war. It is true, also, that a local Alexandria paper might have described him as having been shot down in an altercation, and as he was surrounded by his comrades it might have added that men dressed in the Federal uniform took part in that altercation.

In this case we have this Georgetown paper stating certain things as to which it could not have had knowledge except from rumor, and certain other matters as to which it could have ascertained the truth, and the only fact as to which the truth could have been ascertained is shown to have been the reverse of the statement contained in that paper. But there is other evidence. There are the records of the War Department, which are to the effect that, under date of July 2, 1861, John Holmes, Company A, Seventy-ninth Volunteers, was found dead on the streets of Georgetown, stabbed by some person or persons unknown. There is another affidavit, which was not made twenty years afterwards—the affidavit of the captain of this soldier's company, who testifies to a number of the facts which we have been discussing here, and who testifies that the soldier died in the line of duty.

Now, sir, this was a man who volunteered—who was not drafted into the service, who volunteered at a date when there were no bounties given that could either be an attraction to him or any support for the wife he left behind him—a man who went promptly to the front and entered upon the service, and whose service was cut short by death. I believe, sir, that upon consideration of all the evidence, there is not a gentleman present, not even my friend from Virginia [Mr. JONES], who will insist upon it, as to a soldier who volunteered to defend his country, who did not wait for the inducement of the bounty but went voluntarily and promptly into the service, who is shown to have been performing laborious and faithful service and against whom no suggestion is made—I believe there is no man present who, in order to defeat the claim of that man's widow for recognition by this Government will assume, without even a suggestion of evidence, that he must have committed some crime which induced somebody else to kill him.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. JONES. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 44, noes 5.

So the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY E. TRICKEY.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. 1196) to restore Mary E. Trickey and children of Hartwell M. Trickey to the pension rolls.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed to restore Mary E. Trickey, widow of Hartwell M. Trickey, late of Company I, One hundred and sixth New York Volunteer Infantry, and their children, to the pension rolls as of the date of December 1, 1891.

An amendment in the nature of a substitute, recommended by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, was read, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the act approved June 27, 1890, the name of Mary E. Trickey, as widow of Hartwell M. Trickey, late of Company I, One hundred and sixth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry.

Mr. JONES. I ask that the report be read.

The report (by Mr. HARE) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1196) to pension Mary E. Trickey, have carefully considered the same, and submit the following report:

A similar bill was favorably reported in the Fifty-second Congress, but failed of passage. The facts shown are as follows:

Hartwell M. Trickey served as a private in Company I, One hundred and sixth New York Infantry, from July 22, 1862, until June 22, 1865. He was pensioned at $4 per month for gunshot wound of left forearm, and died June 14, 1889.

Mary E. Trickey applied for pension as his widow, and proved to the satisfaction of the Pension Bureau that she was married to the soldier July 2, 1872, and pension was allowed her under act of June 27, 1890, at $8 per month, plus $2 for each of four children from July 2, 1890. Payment of pension was suspended August 15, 1891, on information tending to show that she was not the legal widow of the soldier, and a special examination was had to determine the facts, which are as follows, as is fully shown by evidence now on file in the Pension Bureau:

The soldier, while home on furlough, was married November 12, 1863, at Ogdensburg, N. Y., to one Jane Ritchey, and remained with her one or two weeks at that time. Again, after his discharge, he lived with her as his wife for about one and a half years, when he went to Pennsylvania and she did not accompany him, and never afterward did they live together. The reasons for this separation do not appear. This separation seems to have been about 1867.

In 1868 the present claimant, Mary E. (Montgomery), met the soldier at Pottsville, Pa., and on July 2, 1872, they were married at Wilkesbarre, Pa., and lived together continuously as man and wife from that time until his death, and they had five children. It appears, however, that the soldier was never divorced from Jane, his first wife, and hence his so-called marriage to Mary E. was not legal. Some two or three years after the separation above referred to Jane commenced to live with one William Rogers, and they had lived and cohabited as man and wife, openly and publicly, since that time, and have a family of four children, one of whom is 20 years of age, and she is commonly known as Jane Rogers. All this is shown by her own admissions and by other evidence.

On November 29, 1890, Jane filed a claim for the accrued pension due the soldier at the date of his death, and although this had already been paid to Mary E., it was determined in the light of all the facts that it must be paid to Jane, as the former payment to Mary E. was illegal; this was accordingly done, and the name of Mary E. was permanently dropped from the rolls. The amount of accrued pension which was thus twice paid seems to have been not more than $13, and possibly not more than $1, if the soldier himself lived to draw the pension for the quarter ending June 4, 1889.

Although it has been determined that Jane was legally entitled to the accrued pension, it does not follow that she is entitled to a continuous pension as widow. It is evident that she has lived as wife with Rogers both before and since the soldier's death, and even if a common-law marriage does not arise on the death of a former husband, her relations with Rogers are clearly such as to defeat a claim by reason of the act of August 7, 1882, as to open and notorious adulterous cohabitation.

Inasmuch as the object of this bill is to pension the beneficiary as an act of justice rather than of strict legal right, and inasmuch as a considerable sum of money has already been paid her illegally, though perhaps through no conscious fault of her own, pension, if allowed, should date from the approval of the act.

Your committee therefore return the bill and recommend that the bill do pass, after being amended as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the act approved June 27, 1890, the name of Mary E. Trickey, as widow of Hartwell M. Trickey, late of Company I, One hundred and sixth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry."

Also amend the title so as to read "A bill to pension Mary E. Trickey."

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I move that the amendment reported by the committee be adopted.

A MEMBER. For what time will the widow then receive pension?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. From the passage of the bill.

Mr. JONES. As a substitute for the motion, I move that the bill be reported to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table. [A pause.] I am informed that there are amendments pending; and I withdraw my motion till those are disposed of.

Mr. NEILL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] a question. If this bill should pass, will not both these women receive pensions?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. No; it pensions simply the woman who met this man in 1872, and not knowing that he was married, married him lawfully, lived with him until his death in 1889, bearing him children. The other woman does not get any pension.

Mr. NEILL. I thought I understood from the reading of the report that she would.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. No, sir.

Mr. NEILL. She is not now on the pension roll?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. She is not. She can not get a pension because of the law of 1882. She had been living with a man named Rogers as his wife for over twenty years, and borne him five children who pass by that name. But by a technical decision of the Pension Bureau it was held that in law she should be regarded as the widow, the Bureau not having at that time the information subsequently obtained as to her cohabitation with Rogers.

Mr. LANE. It seems to me that it is not a matter of the least importance to pass this amendment. I think it clear that this woman is not the widow of the soldier; and that is the question before the House. That is the point on which this case must turn.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The bill without the amendment proposes that the pension date back to the time of the death of the soldier, but the amendment of the committee proposes to grant a pension under the law of June 27, 1890, simply from the time of the passage of the bill.

Mr. LANE. I understand that the bill proposes to pension her from the time that it becomes a law, but my proposition is that she ought not to be pensioned at all.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I apprehend gentlemen who are objecting to this bill have not heard the report.

Mr. LANE. Let us see, then, whether I understand this case. I understand that this man was married at some former time; that he and his wife parted without any legal divorce; that he afterward met the applicant in this bill; they were married, lived together for many years, and had borne to them a family. In the mean time the other woman committed adultery; she went off and lived with some other man, without the marriage tie ever having been severed, and she is still living.

Now, when this woman married the soldier, there was an impediment in the way, and the marriage was in law a nullity. It was an adulterous cohabitation. So far as the testimony shows, all these children were born in adultery. The other wife afterward applied for a pension and received it. The Government paid her a pension, as it was compelled to do.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Paid her $13 arrears.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Her husband's arrears of pension, not hers.

Mr. LANE. They recognized the first wife as the widow of the soldier. There is no doubt in the world that she was the widow of the soldier. There is no question to-day but what she is the widow, in law.

It is proposed now to bring in the law of 1882, which provides that a widow may forfeit her pension by adultery; but that is in the discretion of the Pension Department. There are a great many cases where they do not forfeit their pensions. I know of the case of a widow, which case came into this House two or three years ago. They struck the name of a poor widow from the roll because she happened to have been caught in a single act. Gen. Black, when he was Commissioner, dropped her name from the roll. A bill was introduced in the House to place her on the roll again. I was then chairman of the committee, and I reported the bill favorably, and it passed this House. She was put back on the roll, notwithstanding the fact that she was caught in adultery.

Now, my contention in this case is that this claimant is not the widow of the soldier, and it is of doubtful propriety to attempt to legalize this marriage by this act, and to recognize these children as the offspring of a lawful marriage.

We have plenty of soldiers' widows in this country who ought to be pensioned. There are hundreds and hundreds of claims in the Pension Office awaiting action, and it seems to me that those widows ought to be pensioned before you take up the cases of doubtful propriety. If the real widows, the real orphans, and the real soldiers were all pensioned, then there might be some equitable ground for taking up the cases of others.

I am not disposed to blame this woman. She may have been deceived in this marriage, but the fact remains. Now, if the soldier had lived, and the first wife had died, the second marriage might have become lawful by a change of relations: but the real widow is still living, and there is this impediment in the way, and it seems to me that a pension can not be allowed to this claimant, without a great injustice to the pension roll.

Mr. STALLINGS. I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] a question.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Certainly.

Mr. STALLINGS. From what county in Ohio are these people?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. They are not from Ohio at all. Mr. Trickey was born in the northern part of New York, and went into the army from the northern part of New York, and married in the northern part of New York.

Mr. STALLINGS. That was the first marriage?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. That was the first marriage. Afterwards, in 1867, he left New York and went down into the mining regions of Pennsylvania, where he met this woman, Miss Montgomery, who had no knowledge whatever of his previous marriage.

Mr. STALLINGS. How far was it from the place where he first married to the place of his second marriage?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. About 500 miles.

Mr. STALLINGS. She had no way of knowing about the other marriage.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. She had no way of knowing anything about it, and had no knowledge of the marriage, and married this man in good faith, lived with him as a good wife, raised his children as a good mother, and is now in poverty, and asks through this bill that she may be allowed, from the time of the passage of the bill, $8 per month as the supposed widow of this soldier. That is all there is in it.

Mr. HUDSON. How long did she live with him?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Twenty-one years.

Mr. CABANISS. Mr. Chairman, I think this is a very meritorious case. It appeals to our sense of fairness. It appears from the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] that this good woman is clearly not to blame. She had no knowledge of the previous marriage of her husband. According to the strict letter of the law, the Pension Office could not regard her as the legal wife of the deceased soldier; but it is just such a case as we ought to legislate for, and pass a private bill for the relief of the applicant. Therefore I hope this bill will be reported favorably. [Applause.]

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I can not think that my friend from Georgia [Mr. CABANISS] has read this report carefully or I think he would not say that it is a meritorious case. In the first place, I want to say, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] that if there is any evidence that the lawful wife of this soldier is not now drawing a pension at the hands of the Government, it is not to be found in this report. On the contrary——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I have my information from the Pension Bureau, and this report was drawn by the committee; and if there be any question about it I will step over to the Pension Bureau to-morrow and have it stopped. But under the law of August 7, 1882, she can not draw a pension.

Mr. JONES. I will ask the gentleman what he proposes to stop when he steps over to the Pension Bureau to-morrow?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I would stop any pension illegally drawn, if she be drawing any. I have my information from the Pension Bureau: and if she be drawing any pension she can only be drawing it illegally.

Mr. JONES. I have no information from the Pension Bureau. All the evidence I have is contained in this report. I confess that these reports are exceedingly meager and unsatisfactory. I believe that when you can deduce anything from the reports themselves which goes to show that the claimant ought not to have a pension that the committee ought to accept that testimony.

Now, what do we find in this report. In the first place, the committee will understand that this woman who now seeks to have her name put upon the pension roll as the widow of this dead soldier has drawn the accrued pension due to him at his death, and that the actual widow, the legal wife of this dead man, afterwards applied to the Pension Bureau and also drew that accrued pension.

Mr. TATE. It was only $13.

Mr. JONES. I do not know what the amount was. Whether it be large or small does not make any difference. If it had been $10,000 the principle would have been exactly the same. Both women have drawn the accrued pension; and the report goes on to say that "although it has been determined that Jane was legally entitled to the accrued pension, it does not follow that she is entitled to a continuous pension as widow." Now, I take that language to mean that she is drawing a pension which it does not follow she is entitled to.

Mr. TATE. You take that language in opposition to the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, who has information from the Pension Department that she is not drawing a pension.

Mr. JONES. I am putting aside entirely the statement of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. TATE. Ought we not to take the statement of the gentleman when he states that he gets his information from the Department.

Mr. JONES. Well, the gentleman may take that view of it if he chooses. I am not questioning the statement of the gentleman from Ohio. I am arguing this case from the testimony furnished us by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, whose duty it was to investigate this matter and to get all obtainable information from the Pension Department.

Mr. TATE. If the gentleman will allow me. Do I understand the gentleman to say to this House that when the Pension Department does not furnish the proper proof to that committee that it may not be furnished by others?

Mr. JONES. I mean to say this, that it is a very bad practice to base a pension claim upon the testimony as set forth in the report made by the committee and then disregard that testimony when it is found to be insufficient upon examination here and base it upon a statement made by a gentleman on the floor of this House, without at all questioning the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, because I am satisfied that he obtained that statement from the Pension Department when he says he did. I may be permitted to say that the Committee on Invalid Pensions which reported, and which is supposed to have examined the evidence in the case, should have put this testimony in the record. It is of vital importance and could not have been considered otherwise by that committee.

Mr. TATE. I want to understand the gentleman. Do I understand you to say that when a member of this House comes before the House and states that he has received certain information from the Pension Department that this House is not to take that statement as absolutely true in the absence of anything to the contrary.

Mr. JONES. I say this: That in a case of that sort, in my opinion, the report ought to be recommitted to the committee that reported it, and I do not think that it ought to be spread upon the record and that it should go to the world that a pension was granted upon it, when in fact it did not justify the granting of a pension.

Now, we are asked to discredit the report of the committee; and that is why I repeat what I said when another case was up before this committee this evening, that we can not rely upon the evidence set forth in these meager and unsatisfactory reports. We are called upon every few days to pass upon pension claims upon the testimony set forth in these reports, and nearly always that testimony has to be supplemented by the statements of gentlemen on the floor before the claim can be favorably considered.

Mr. BRETZ. If the gentleman will allow me. Suppose the gentleman from Ohio should go before the Committee on Invalid Pensions and make the same statement that he has made to the House, and that fact was found in the RECORD, would it make any practical difference to the House in what connection the statement was made?

Mr. JONES. It would be a part of the record in this case then.

Mr. BRETZ. What is the difference between that and now? It goes into the RECORD.

Mr. JONES. It is not a part of the testimony in the case. Of course the statement goes into the RECORD as a part of the remarks of the member.

Mr. BRETZ. It goes into the RECORD in connection with this case.

Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. JONES. Certainly.

Mr. HARE. What particular defect is excepted to or complained of in this report?

Mr. JONES. The particular defect that I complain of is that the report seems to convey the idea, or to bear the construction, that the woman who was the lawful wife of this dead soldier but who is living in adultery is drawing to-day a pension from the Government, and that if we pass this bill two persons will be drawing pension on account of this dead soldier. He will be given just one more widow than a good soldier is entitled to leave behind him.

Mr. CABANISS. Could not the difficulty upon the gentleman's mind be obviated by providing that this woman should not receive a pension if the other wife was drawing pension?

Mr. JONES. Possibly; but that question is not now before the committee. Now I, for one, have been looking somewhat into these reports, and when I examine one of them I want to feel that it contains all the evidence that is necessary to justify the granting of the pension, or at least all the evidence that is obtainable.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. JONES. Yes, sir.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The gentleman will admit that Jane Rogers is not entitled to a pension under the law?

Mr. JONES. I will answer that by asking the gentleman another question.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Oh, that is the law, plainly and clearly, that the soldier's widow who is living in adultery shall not continue to draw the pension. The very moment the Bureau is informed of that fact it is the duty of the Commissioner to suspend that pension, and it is very often done in such cases. Now that certainly ought not to operate against any wish of this House to do justice to the other woman. She is not to blame for the conduct of Jane Rogers. Since she has been living in my district she has been living at least 1,500 miles away from Jane Rogers, and is not responsible for her in any way.

Mr. LANE. Has this woman had a chance to be heard before the committee? Because if she had she might disprove these statements.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Disprove the evidence before the committee?

Mr. LANE. Certainly. She might be able to do it. She certainly ought to have been heard before she was condemned.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The evidence was that she admitted that she had been living with Rogers for twenty years, and had had children by him.

Mr. LANE. Was she there before the committee?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. No; but in the papers before the committee was her admission of the fact, and upon that same ground her pension was stopped.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman from Ohio asked me a question, and my answer to it is this, that whether or not Jane Rogers, the lawful widow, can now draw a pension, she did go to the Pension Office and did draw the accrued pension of her dead husband after the other woman had already drawn the same amount. The woman whose name is now sought to be put upon the rolls had already drawn the accrued pension. Whether or not she knew of the existence of the lawful wife and informed the Department of it when she drew the pension I do not know, but I do know that she drew the accrued pension and that afterwards the actual widow of the dead man came and drew the same amount of money out of the Treasury. Now, it may be that this woman, when she drew that accrued pension, knew of the existence of the lawful widow, and it was her duty in that case to have disclosed the fact to the Pension Office.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Mr. Chairman, I think my friend from Virginia fails to properly comprehend the practice of the Department. It does not anywhere appear, nor is it reasonable to suppose, that this widow, as she is now claimed to be the beneficiary of this bill, had any knowledge of her husband's previous marriage, and upon the presentation of proof by her that she was the widow of the soldier, which presentation she made honestly, the Department paid her the accrued pension. Then, on the further presentation of the case by the actual legal widow, it was found that she was entitled to the pension and it was paid to her. Further investigation disclosed the fact that she was living in such a manner as not to be entitled to a pension, and she received no more, nor can she receive any more under the law.

Mr. JONES. The report does not show that.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. No matter whether it does or not. It is to be assumed, I think, that an existing law continues to operate, and that it does not necessarily have to be expressed in every report of this kind, and my friend from Virginia, being a lawyer, knows that the law of 1882 prohibits the payment of pension to a woman under such circumstances, and that it is not necessary to set out the law in the committee's report.

Mr. JONES. The objection is not that the law is not set out in the report. It is that the fact ought to be shown that the lawful wife is not actually drawing a pension; that fact ought to be stated if it is actually a fact. It ought certainly to appear in the report. On the contrary the report states, if it states anything on that subject, that she is enjoying a pension. That is my construction of the language employed, and no gentleman has said that it is not a fair and just construction.

Now, the gentleman from New York presumes that the woman who is now applying for a pension did not know of the existence of this true widow. No such presumption is raised by any statement contained in the report.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. That is the natural presumption which everyone would adopt; and the Department has acknowledged it.

Mr. JONES. All these pensions are granted on that sort of presumption. That is what I object to. I want the conclusions that are drawn here to be based upon facts. I am not willing to stand here and vote away the public money to a woman who was never the lawful widow of this man, but who has drawn the accrued pension that the Department decided to belong to another, and which has actually been paid to that other, who is unquestionably the lawful and only widow, whatever may have been her conduct.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Thirteen dollars!

Mr. JONES. I do not care whether the amount is $13 or $13,000, the character of the act is precisely the same. If the sum were 13 cents the case would not be any better. That circumstance would simply show the eagerness of this woman to get what she could as the widow of a man, when she was not in fact his widow. That, it seems to me, fully answers the question that the gentleman has asked.

But what are th eequities in this case? In the first place, you are asking the Secretary of the Interior to do an impossibility. You are asking him by this amendment to put the name of this woman on the pension roll as the widow of Hartwell M. Trickey, when she never was his widow and can not be under any circumstances. You are requiring him to falsify the well-established and well-admitted facts in this case.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. The object of this bill is to supply a defect in the provisions of the general law.

Mr. JONES. The object of this amendment seems to be to contradict what is an absolute fact and to state as true that which could not by any possibility be true—that this woman is the widow of a man to whom she could not have been lawfully married and whose lawful wife she never was.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. We do not propose to declare that she is the widow; but to pension her as the widow.

Mr. JONES. She is to be placed upon the roll as the widow of Hartwell M. Trickey when she is not and never can be made his widow, even by an act of Congress.

Mr. CURTIS of New York. Why is not that all right? She is not declared to have been his widow.

Mr. JONES. Now, I want to speak of the equities in this case.

Mr. STALLINGS. Would not the marriage which appears to have taken place in this case be a good common-law marriage? If they announced themselves as man and wife, are they not to be considered as such under the common law, although there may have been no formal ceremony?

Mr. JONES. With the legal wife living?

Mr. STALLINGS. But this woman did not know that.

Mr. JONES. Whether she knew it or not, I say it would not be a good common-law marriage; and I do not think there can be any two opinions between lawyers on that point.

But I want to discuss the so-called equities of this case. This soldier married this claimant July 2, 1872, at Wilkesbarre, Pa. She never was his wife, because at the date of that marriage and up to the moment of his death he was the husband of Jane Rogers. During the time that he served in the army she never shared any of his hardships, or privations, or discomforts, but long after the war, when he had a legal wife living, married him; and although that woman is living to-day, and although my friend from Ohio says that if he finds out upon investigation at the Pension Office that she is drawing a pension he will stop that pension, I say that this committee ought not to go ahead and put this woman on the pension roll as the widow of this man when she never was his lawful wife, and never could have been such. In the face of that fact she went to the Pension Bureau and demanded the accrued pension which his legal wife was entitled to, and obtained it. Why should she be placed upon the pension rolls?

It seems to me this case is too plain for discussion; that there are no equities that can appeal to any member in behalf of this bill, that can appeal to the sense of justice and fairness of anybody in the world. I insist that this bill should not be passed upon favorably. There is nothing in the case that commends it to my judgment. The claimant married the soldier long after the war, and whether she knew that he then had a lawful wife or not, there can not be two lawful, actual widows of one man. The line must be drawn somewhere. Congress can not undertake to pension everybody who is poor and needy.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I desire to say just a few words. I do not desire to detain the committee long. Let me say in the first place that I take with the utmost kindness any criticism of any report made by our committee, and I invite criticism on every proper occasion; but I wish any gentleman who criticises the committee could be present at our meetings and see the care and the time taken by that committee in the discussion of these questions, going into all the evidence that can be obtained, in every shape and form, and oftentimes after we have considered all the evidence before us, seeing if we can not find still more, calling on the Pension Office, and calling on the member who introduced the bill, with a view, as far as we can, to conscientiously report all the facts with our honest judgment.

Another thing. I think in every case reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions we have placed in the report all the facts, whether they be for or against the claim, as it might seem to a casual observer. We feel that the House and the Committee of the Whole are entitled to a statement or a finding of the same facts ascertained by us.

Now, what are the facts in this case? The soldier was married to some woman away in Northern New York. He served about three years in the war. The marriage, I believe, occurred in the town of Ogdensburg. He came home, and after living a short time with the woman he had married, with whom he had never lived previous to that for more than a few weeks, he went away down into Pennsylvania, a distance of some hundreds of miles, and there he met this other woman. He met her in 1868. An acquaintance sprang up. In 1872 she married him. He was drawing a pension as a soldier. She lived with him as his wife. She bore him five children. She lived with him and cared for him in his wounded condition for a period of seventeen years.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I submit to every member of this committee that the taint of wrong does not come near this woman's garments. We must look at her as she is and look at this case not only from our standpoint, but look at it as she did when she, in good faith, as she supposed she had the right to do, married this man, as she believed, and as far as she is concerned, in the eyes of her neighbors, and in the eyes of the great God himself, did marry him, and lived with him as a true and virtuous wife, caring for him and bearing him children.

Now, another point in the case. After he died this woman, still supposing herself to be his widow, made an application to the Pension Office, proved her marriage, proved his death, obtained the pension, all indicating the best of faith on her part.

After the soldier died, the woman whom he first married heard of it in some way, and she made application to the Pension Office, not for a pension, because she could not obtain that, and if she had obtained one as his widow and had then began the course of life which the evidence in this case shows she did begin, the very moment she began that kind of life the pension would not simply be suspended, but would terminate under the provisions of the law. Upon the information given by her the Pension Office was obliged to pay her under the act of March 1, 1869, the arrears of her husband's pension, amounting probably to $1, possibly to $13, and no more. There is no law upon the statute book that could keep her out of that, no difference how far she may have been sunken in the depths of her own degradation.

But, Mr. Chairman, under another law, the act of August 7, 1882, although she may draw the arrears due to her husband regardless of how she was living, yet when she comes to place her own case before the Pension Bureau, she has no standing. If she had succeeded and the facts had become known to the Pension Bureau, at that moment her pension would have terminated; and had the facts come to the Pension Bureau before they passed upon the case, no pension could be granted to her.

Now, another thing. I will not undertake to go into the question of what constitutes a common-law marriage. It is sufficient to say that this first wife of the dead soldier has been living for twenty years or more with another man, has borne him four children, and that that fact shuts her out for all time to come from the pension roll.

But let us see another fact. If in point of fact, the marriage relationship existing between her and her second so-called husband has continued from the date of the soldier's death until now, I ask if that would not raise a common-law marriage or some presumption of it, which, aside from the question of adultery, would cut her out of a pension in the Pension Office? Now, then, briefly, here is a woman who appeared before the Committee on Invalid Pensions, through the evidence obtained from the Pension Office, obtained not by ex parte affidavits, but by special examination into all the facts made under the law by a special examiner.

These facts came before the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

They are now before the House, perfectly or imperfectly described as they may be in the reports, in support of this claim.

The fact of the matter is that this soldier rendered more than three years' service, that he came home wounded, that he took this woman in and took her to his arms as his wife, that she went to him and lived with him as his wife, cared for him, reared his children in the honest belief that they were the lawful children of that woman and this soldier. What is there in equity that stands between her and granting her a pension? Let me say, further, before this report was made, although it does not seem to appear specifically in the report, the matter was carefully examined as to whether any pension had ever been granted to this so-called first wife.

I desire to say to the committee now, upon the most positive information, that that woman has never drawn or applied for a pension, and if she does she can never receive it. In common justice what stands between the granting to this woman, pure in her life, needy as she is in her old days with this soldier's children to support—what stands between her and our sense of right in granting her a pension under the act of June 27, 1890? [Applause.]

Mr. MEREDITH. Mr. Chairman, I have no disposition to criticise the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and I certainly do not criticise the honorable chairman of that committee; but I do think that this is a case in which the committee should have followed the good advice given by Mr. Weller to his son Samuel when he told him, "Beware of the vidders."

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is a principle underlying this whole thing which is shown by the report of the committee. This report asks us to subscribe to a principle which I can not subscribe to, upon the ground that a woman must first have been a wife before she can be a widow. This report says that this woman was never the wife of this man Trickey; and, therefore, she can not be his widow. I think it is stretching it a little far when we are asked by the committee, and by the patron of the bill, or by anyone else, to put upon the pension rolls a woman as the widow of a man who never was her husband. The question may be asked when these people have passed away, as was asked on a former occasion, whose wife will this woman be when they are all under ground.

But, Mr. Chairman, let me say to my friend who has asked what stands between this woman and a pension in equity, that there is something which stands between them which was necessary. That was a marriage, a legitimate, not a bigamous marriage, as occurred between these parties. That is what stands between them; and it is sufficient to bar her from pension. And while in these little difficulties between Jane and Mary we may sympathize with Mary, the bigamous wife, this committee can not now join in wedlock that man who has died and this woman who is claiming a pension and make them man and wife, because he did not seek the only remedy he could have sought in life by obtaining a divorce from his first wife before he committed the bigamous marriage. I say that is a principle to which I can not subscribe.

I have sympathy for this unfortunate woman, but I can not subscribe to such a principle as will allow this committee, by this action to-night, to grant a pension to a woman who never was the wife of this man. That is the underlying principle which controls me. I know of no principle of law which will recognize a woman as a widow until she has been a wife.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MEREDITH. I will answer it with great pleasure.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Suppose that we were a State Legislature having jurisdiction and an application were made in this case to pass a bill to declare, for property purposes, that these children were the lawful children of this soldier and this woman his lawful widow, would the gentleman from Virginia hesitate a moment under the circumstances to vote for the passage of such a bill?

Mr. MEREDITH. I certainly would hesitate, not only for a moment, but for a lifetime. I would not vote for such a bill, and believing, as I do, that it is wrong in principle, however much I may sympathize with this woman, I can not vote for the passage of this bill. ["Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a few words upon this question.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will let us have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. If the gentleman from Ohio desires to have a vote regardless of whether there is a quorum or not, I have no objection. I never make the point of no quorum myself upon these pension bills.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Well, I will yield to the request of the gentleman from Ohio and withhold the remarks I desired to submit upon the bill.

The question being taken on the substitute reported from the committee, it was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on laying the bill as amended aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The question being taken, the Chairman declared that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. JONES. I ask for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 49, noes 4.

Mr. JONES. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of no quorum is made, and the Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES].

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Chairman, I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Virginia for his courtesy. I withdraw the bill.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is very welcome, if he puts it upon that ground.

MARTHA A. HOLT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. 3971) for the relief of Martha A. Holt, the widow of Thomas C. Holt.

The bill was read.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the introducer of that bill is not present this evening, and I ask unanimous consent that it be passed over without prejudice.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

PICKENS T. REYNOLDS.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. 5802) to increase the pension of Pickens T. Reynolds, of Hall County, Ga.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of Pickens T. Reynolds, of Hall County, Ga., a soldier of the Indian war of 1837 and 1838, from $8 to $20 per month.

An amendment reported from the committee, striking out "twenty" before the word "dollars" and inserting "twelve" was adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill as amended aside, to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PICKLER. In what war did this soldier serve?

Mr. TATE. He served in the Cherokee Indian war in 1836–'37, and lost one of his eyes.

The bill as amended was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WIDOW AND HEIRS OF MARCELLUS PETTITT.

The next pension business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. 3722) for the relief of the widow and heirs of Marcellus Pettitt.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in adjudicating the pension claim of the widow and heirs of Marcellus Pettitt, of Company G, Twenty-first Missouri Infantry Volunteers, the fatal disease of the soldier, contracted in active service with the State troops prior to muster into the United States service, shall be deemed and admitted as having been contracted in the line of duty in the United States service.

The report (by Mr. MARTIN of Indiana) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions have considered the bill (H. R. 3722) granting a pension to the widow and heirs of Marcellus Pettitt, and submit the following adverse report:

There is no record of the military service of this soldier, Marcellus Pettitt. A special act was passed in 1891 to place his name on the rolls of the Twenty-first Missouri Infantry, to date from February 1, 1862. The widow's claim for pension was then rejected by the Pension Bureau on the ground that the disease (measles) of which soldier died, February 10, 1862, was contracted prior to his entering the service, as fixed by the special act.

The widow has long since remarried to a Mr. Ruth, who is living. The one daughter of the soldier is over 30 years of age and also married. The purpose of this bill is to give pension to the former widow for the period between the death of the soldier and her remarriage, and to the daughter from the mother's remarriage until she became 16 years of age. This would be an aggregate sum of considerable amount in each case. It would be arrears of pension, pure and simple, and not in any sense a present pension for relief of present necessity—in fact it does not appear that any present necessity exists.

The law (section 4720, Revised Statutes) provides that pension under special act, unless otherwise provided in the act itself, shall begin from the approval of such special act, and it has long been the policy of Congress not to favorably consider any private legislation the effect of which would be to grant arrears of pensions in any form whatever.

For these reasons, which appear to be well founded, your committee recommend that the bill do lie on the table.

The views of the minority were read, as follows:

The minority of the Committee on Invalid Pensions have considered the bill to pension the widow and heirs of Marcellus Pettitt (H. R. 3722) and submit the following report:

In 1891, by special act of Congress, the name of Marcellus Pettitt was placed on the muster rolls of the Twenty-first Missouri Infantry, to date from February 1, 1862, on the following statement of facts in the report of the Committee on Military Affairs:

"In 1861 two regiments of Missouri Home Guards were called into active service and performed considerable active duty. They were called the First and Second N. E. Missouri Volunteers. These two regiments were consolidated in 1862 and mustered into the United States service as the Twenty-first Missouri Volunteers.

"Marcellus Pettitt enlisted in the First N. E. Missouri Volunteers about October 1, 1861, and served in said regiment until the last week in January, 1862. On or about February 1, 1862, said regiment was mustered in as a part of the Twenty-first Missouri Volunteer Infantry. That said Marcellus Pettitt, at the time his regiment went to Canton, Mo., to be mustered in, was left behind at Memphis, Mo., in hospital sick with measles, and that he was unable to go to Canton, Mo., for muster with his regiment. That said Marcellus Pettitt died of measles February 10, 1862, at Memphis, Mo., in hospital. That he was not mustered in with his comrades because of his illness. These facts appear from evidence filed in the Pension Office and supplemented by statement of Mr. LACEY, member of the House of Representatives."

The widow's claim for pension was rejected November 3, 1891, on the ground that the soldier's fatal disease, "measles," originated prior to commencement of his service as fixed by the special act of Congress, there being no record of his service in the organizations which were consolidated to make the Twenty-first Missouri Infantry.

It thus appears that the special act referred to has failed of its purpose, to give the soldier's widow and children a pensionable status, and the purpose of this present bill is to carry into effect the intent of the former act.

The widow having remarried to one Ruth, the pensionable status would cease at date of remarriage. She filed her claim in due time, and the only reason why her claim was not allowed under the general law was because of the failure of her husband to be formerly mustered into the United States service before contracting his disease, although he had for several months been engaged in actual service in the field with his command.

We, the minority, respectfully recommend the passage of the bill, as it only carries out the manifest intention of the Fifty-first Congress.

JOHN F. LACEY.
J. A. PICKLER.
L. M. STRONG.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. CLARK of Missouri). The question is on laying this bill aside to be reported to the House with the recommend tion that it do pass.

Mr. JONES. The report of the committee is unfavorable.

The CHAIRMAN. That does not make any difference. The bill having a place on the Calendar, the question is on laying it aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. TATE. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it lie on the table.

Mr. LACEY. I think it is due to the Chair and to the committee that this bill should be explained. I admit that there is an unfavorable report of the majority of the committee, but there is a favorable report by the minority, and I crave the attention of gentlemen to this case, because I think it appeals to their good judgment and their favorable consideration. It is not a case where the parties are asking charity; they are asking simply a legal right which they ought to have under the laws of the land.

In June, 1861, there were organized in North Missouri a number of militia companies who entered active service and served faithfully during that season and during the winter of 1861. They were engaged in battle at various places; many of them were killed. And, Mr. Chairman, I feel some special interest in this case because of the fact that I served in immediate conjunction with these particular men, although I did not know the soldier in question. The first Union soldiers I ever saw dead were men of this organization. I remember seeing five of these men lying by the roadside stiff in death, with their faces covered with their hats. It was anything but a cheerful sight as we passed by.

Now, my recollection is that the soldiers of these organizations served as faithfully as any soldiers from Iowa, Illinois, or any other State. But they were not mustered until the following February. They were ordered to report at the town of Canton, Mo., for muster. This particular soldier on the way was taken sick with the measles, and was left in the hospital at Memphis, Mo., where he died without ever having been mustered in. This matter was laid before Congress several years ago, and a bill was passed, which I will read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is empowered and directed to enter the name of Marcellus Pettitt upon the muster roll of Company G, Twenty-first Missouri Infantry Volunteers, from the first day of February, 1862, to the tenth day of February, 1862, the latter being the date of his death, and his muster having been prevented by his fatal illness.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this act was not carried into effect by Gen. Raum, as Commissioner of Pensions, for the reasons which I will state. It is said that the records of the two organizations which were consulted failed to show that the soldier belonged to either of them, and that in the absence of such record his services can not be recognized prior to February 1, 1862.

I have here evidence which was presented to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, in which it is stated that under an act of Congress passed in 1862 the men of these regiments were formally enrolled for payment and their pay and allowances were paid to them prior to the muster in. It appears, however, that Mr. Pettitt, by reason of his death, was not put upon the rolls, although he served just the same as the others did. In other words, he lost his pensionable status by his death and by the failure of the officers to put upon the rolls a record of the services which he in fact did perform.

His widow filed a claim for pension soon after his death, and his minor child also filed a claim after the remarriage of the widow. There would be several years of pension due them; this bill, which proposes simply to carry out the purpose of the act of the Fifty-first Congress, would give to these two persons that which in law they ought to have and of which they have been deprived only by the failure of the officers to make a proper record upon the roll of that regiment respecting the soldier's services.

These being the facts the minority of the committee have instructed me to present this matter to the Committee of the Whole. I believe it is an absolutely just and righteous claim.

It is said, however, that it ought not to be allowed because the Government did not pay it long ago. Well, there is no interest claimed. The payment we now propose ought to have been made in 1863 or 1864 or 1865. It was not made at that time because of the defect in the rolls, which was no fault of Mr. Pettitt; for he died in the service; he sacrificed his life for the benefit of the country, leaving his widow and child behind him; and they ought to receive the benefit proposed to be granted by this bill.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. Is it not a fact also that the services of the Missouri Home Guard were recognized by the Government of the United States in issuing to them military bounty land warrants?

Mr. LACEY. Yes; and this particular regiment became afterward Col. Moore's regiment, the Twenty-first Missouri, the same regiment that commenced the battle at Shiloh, bringing on the engagement there and doing the most distinguished service.

The members of this body from the State of Missouri who happen to be here to-night will bear witness with me to the distinguished services of the Twenty-first Missouri, both before and after the mustering. The honorable gentleman who now sits in the chair [Mr. DOCKERY] I see nods his head approvingly. He lives in the locality where that regiment was raised, and knows that the service of these men, performed prior to the muster, was just as honorable and just as much entitled to consideration as that of any troops from any other part of the State.

Mr. PICKLER. They were the safeguard of Southern Iowa.

Mr. LACEY. They were the safeguard of Southern Iowa. They threw themselves into the service without uniforms, armed with their shotguns and squirrel rifles, and they served faithfully until February, 1862.

Mr. HULICK. Was this soldier under the command and pay of the Government of the United States?

Mr. LACEY. This soldier was not, because he died before he was mustered in, but after his death Congress passed an act directing the roll to be made up. A commission was appointed which sat at St. Louis and made up the rolls, and upon these rolls these regiments, including the Twenty-first Missouri, were paid for the service that they rendered prior to the muster, but this man had no one to speak for him then, and as a matter of fact was not put upon the roll.

Mr. HULICK. Have his heirs or any persons interested been paid for his services to the Government?

Mr. LACEY. No.

Mr. WEVER. They could not be, because he was not mustered.

Mr. LACEY. They could not be, because of this defect in the muster. Now, Congress attempted to act upon this case, but because of a technical ruling of Gen. Raum that action was ineffectual. I do not complain of the action of Gen. Raum, because I believe he did what he believed to be right and what the rules of his office technically required him to do; but by a technical ruling upon his part the act of Congress was made inoperative. Congress directed that this man be mustered, so as to give the benefit of his service to his heirs; but he was not put upon the pension rolls because of the failure to have his name recorded on the pay roll; and he could not have that done, because he was dead. Now, I ask that we report this bill back to the House with a favorable recommendation. Let it be said that this House views these cases with liberality and justice.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I think it is but due to this committee, as well as to the majority of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to make a very short statement.

I have before me here the report, made September 26, 1890, but the bill was not passed until some time in 1891. That was a bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, and the object of it was to place the name of this soldier upon the muster roll. It seems that he had enlisted and started with his comrades for the purpose of being mustered in, but before he got more than started, he was taken sick and left at Memphis, where, ten days later, he died. His term of service was, all told, ten days. He died of the measles.

Now, the effect of this act of 1891, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, was simply to direct that his name be entered on the muster roll; but here is the trouble about the bill: Suppose that in point of fact he had actually been mustered in; his widow and children could not have drawn a pension under the law anyhow, because, as the record in the Pension Office shows, he had contracted the disease from which he died before the date of the muster.

Mr. LACEY. Certainly; but they put it upon the ground, though, that the rolls failed to show his prior service; but if the rolls had shown him to be entered as a member of that organization prior to the muster, then he would have been entitled to a pension. The records of the two organizations failed to show his service prior to February 1; and yet this report to which attention is called said that he enlisted on or about October 1. He served four months.

Mr. PICKLER. He was good enough to fight, and good enough to die.

Mr. LACEY. As a matter of fact, I will say to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MARTIN] that Col. Ainsworth reports that some members of this company were enrolled as early as June 15, 1861. We do not know the exact date of this man's enrollment, but we do know he was enrolled as early as October 1.

Mr. MOSES. Was this gentleman at the battle of Shiloh?

Mr. LACEY. No; he died before that.

Mr. MOSES. Was he ever in any battle?

Mr. LACEY. Oh, yes; his command was in several battles.

Mr. MOSES. During the ten days?

Mr. LACEY. They were at Blue Mills. That is the only fight I know personally of their being in. I know five of them were killed just before entering the battle of Blue Mills.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Now, Mr. Chairman, the fact nevertheless remains that by this special act with reference to muster his name was entered on the rolls February 1, 1862.

Mr. LACEY. That is the date the others were mustered.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Now, then, suppose that in point of fact he had actually been mustered at that date and that no special bill was necessary, his widow and child could not have received the pension at any rate.

Mr. LACEY. Oh, yes, they could, if the rolls showed his real service; but the rolls failed to show it. That is what the Commissioner of Pensions says.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I take it as a matter of law that they can not go beyond that, because the disease was contracted prior to entering the service and he was reported as mustered.

Mr. PICKLER. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Now, then, let me state another fact, if the gentleman from South Dakota will excuse me just a little. This is not a bill putting the widow and child upon the pension roll. It is not a pension bill of that kind at all. This is a bill simply to pay arrears from the date of the death of the soldier until the child became 16 years of age, in the one case, and in the other case until the widow remarried. Both the widow and the daughter have married. The daughter is now a woman of 30 years of age. Supposing that the widow had remained single, it might possibly have been made a stronger case in this committee and the House; but here is a question purely and squarely as to whether this House will grant arrears.

It has been, so far as I know, universally the practice of this House, under all administrations, no difference who constituted the Committee on Invalid Pensions, not to recommend, if they knew it, the passage of any bill the effect of which would simply be to carry arrears. If you pass this bill this widow will receive no pension and the daughter will receive no pension; but in the one case the widow and her husband will receive a lump sum, and in the other case the daughter and her husband will receive a lump sum, representing what would be coming to them under the general pension laws of the United States from the date of the death of the soldier up to the time the widow remarried and up to the time the daughter became 16 years of age.

Mr. STALLINGS. How much would that sum be?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Not a very large sum. I do not place it on the ground of the sum of money it would be, but it would be somewhat of a sum. I desire to call the attention of the committee simply to it on account of the fact that the precedents are against the allowance of arrears in this House. I have no fault to find with the gentleman from Iowa, and his colleagues who joined him, but I bring it to your attention to determine whether you are willing now, by the passage of this bill, to establish a precedent which in the future will invite bill after bill for the payment of arrears of pension.

Mr. PICKLER. Now, while the gentleman talks about arrears, that is not exactly the fact. This claim was filed in 1863, and all that is sought here is to adjudicate this claim as if the record showed that this man was really in the service. Was not the object and the sole object, the only object of the act of 1891 to give this pensionable status to these people, and to that soldier; and was not that the object of that act, and the sole object of that act, and ought not this Congress in good faith to carry out the intent of that act?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I can not say what was in the mind of the committee.

Mr. PICKLER. The very object of the act was to give a pensionable status to these people.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I will tell you what was the object, and a very laudable one. I take it that any widow or any child of a soldier who died in the service would not want to lose the honor of the fact that the father or husband had died, had, in point of fact, died in the service; and that they would desire the records of the War Department should show that fact, if by some misfortune or sickness or negligence of an officer his name was left off the roll. It was something that they would have the right to complain of, and they would have the right to have a bill passed showing what his military status really was.

Mr. STALLINGS. We have passed bills of that very kind, to put their names on the rolls.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Another fact, in answer to the question of my friend as to the amount of the arrears. I see I made a mistake when I said the amount would be small. I did not think that the question whether it was a large or a small amount cut much of a figure in the matter; but since I made the statement that it would be a small amount, I desire to be correct in my statement. This is the bill.

That in adjudicating the pension claim of the widow and heirs of Marcellus Petdit, of Company G, Twenty-first Missouri Infantry Volunteers, the fatal disease of the soldier, contracted in active service with the State troops prior to muster into the United States service, shall be deemed and admitted as having been contracted in the line of duty in the United States service.

Now, then, I take it, unless I am mistaken, that the effect of that would be to give arrears of pension from the date of the soldier's death until remarriage.

Mr. LACEY. Let me ask my colleague on the committee if it is not a fact, under the act of 1873, if the service had been proved upon the 4th of July, 1874, it would have carried arrears?

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Possibly.

Mr. LACEY. So that this only carries out the intention of that law. They could not prove it up on account of this want of record of service. They were not to blame for it. That should be considered as only delaying the claim. I think they ought to have it; and it is absolutely right.

Mr. PICKLER. It is a misnomer to call it arrears.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman shall have a direct vote.

Mr. LACEY. I move that the committee report this bill back to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws the motion to lay the bill on the table, and the gentleman from Iowa moves that the bill be reported back to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. LACEY. Division.

The committee divided, and there were—ayes 19; noes 20.

Mr. LACEY. I ask for tellers.

Mr. PICKLER. What is the motion?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion was made to lay the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. LACEY. I will not make the point of no quorum. Evidently the committee seems to be interested in this bill, as the vote is so close, and I will ask that the bill be laid aside without prejudice.

Mr. STALLINGS. I object to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the bill be laid aside without prejudice, retaining its place on the Calendar. Was that the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. LACEY. That is it, sir.

Mr. STALLINGS. I object.

Mr. LACEY. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we take a vote on this bill in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. That request can not be submitted. The bill can only get into the House either on a favorable or adverse report from the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PICKLER. The bill will have to be disposed of in some way. It can not remain on the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. Undoubtedly it will have to be disposed of. The motion of the gentleman from Iowa that the bill be laid aside with a favorable report has been rejected, 19 gentlemen voting in the affirmative and 20 in the negative.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If this bill is laid aside with an adverse report it will come up in the House in that way, will it not?

The CHAIRMAN. It will.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. Then I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do lie on the table.

Mr. PICKLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that this seems to me pretty hard treatment for this widow and these children. If the committee lay this bill aside to be reported adversely to the House, they simply say that although this man died in the service, although he went into the army and served four months and met his death there, yet, on account of the failure of the Government officers to do their duty, his children are to suffer.

Further than that, this committee puts itself on record as unfriendly to the legislation of 1891. The former Congress passed upon this very question, and now this House takes the unfriendly position of undertaking, by this recommendation, to repeal the action of that Congress. I want to say further in connection with what the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] has said—because I live upon the Iowa border and know what this Twenty-first Missouri Regiment was—that it saved Southern Iowa from being overrun by the guerrillas and others who were in the field from Northern Missouri and were adverse to the Union cause. These were brave soldiers, and not only in the State of Missouri, where so many loyal men volunteered to defend the Union, but all over the West the fame of Col. Moore and the Twenty-first Missouri Volunteers is as a household word. Now, although one Congress has passed upon this question, and although that act was designed to give these people only what was honestly due them, yet now this House undertakes to reverse that action and to say that they were not entitled to what that Congress gave them.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. If the other Congress gave it to them why can not they get it under that legislation?

Mr. PICKLER. Because of the technicality which was explained by the gentleman from Iowa. Simply because the Government officers did not place their names upon the rolls as they ought to have done. It is not arrearage. It is simply adjudicating the case as filed in 1863. There is no arrearage about it, but it is simply paying what is honestly and justly due. If we are to stand here upon such technicalities: if it has come to this, that after a service like this and the death of the soldier in the service this widow and orphans can not have consideration here, then I think there is very little hope for any of these pension bills. I believe that if this committee thoroughly understood the service of that regiment they would not hesitate, especially in a case like this where the soldier lost his life, to grant these heirs what is honestly and justly due.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. How much pension would be granted by this bill if it should pass?

Mr. PICKLER. The chairman of the committee has stated that. I do not know the exact amount, and I do not care. The chairman of the committee has very well said that it is not a question of amount. Whatever the amount is, it would not break the Government; it would not be as much as the increase allowed to the widow of a soldier of the Indian war of 1837 by this committee not more than ten minutes ago.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I call for the regular order. I enjoy these speeches very much, but I call for the regular order.

Mr. PICKLER. Well, I have the floor. The gentleman from Illinois interrupted me, and I want to say to him in all friendliness that in dealing with the claims of these soldiers' widows it seems to make all the difference in the world what war the husband fought in.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois. I throw back to the gentleman his remark in the same spirit in which he makes it.

Mr. PICKLER. Well, the gentleman can throw it back.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order. The regular order is demanded. The motion to report the bill with the recommendation that it lie on the table is not debatable.

Mr. STALLINGS. But it has already been debated on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota was proceeding by consent, and no point of order was made.

Mr. STALLINGS. But the regular order was called several times.

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. To make a motion which takes precedence of the motion now before the committee, I move to reconsider the vote by which this bill was laid aside with an unfavorable recommendation.

Mr. MEREDITH. How did the gentleman vote?

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. I did not vote on the proposition.

Mr. STALLINGS. I make the point of order that the gentleman has not the right to make the motion to reconsider.

The CHAIRMAN. There was no record vote; and the rule which ordinarily requires a motion to reconsider to be made by some gentleman who voted on the prevailing side does not apply.

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. I make a motion which under Rule XVIII takes precedence of the motion now before the committee.

Mr. LANE. There is another motion pending, however—an intervening motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hardly thinks the motion to reconsider is in order at this moment. The Chair had put the other motion; and the gentleman from South Dakota was proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. MEIKLEJOHN. Do I understand the Chair to rule that the motion I make does not take precedent of the motion now pending?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will submit the question on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the Committee of the Whole decided to report the bill to the House with an unfavorable recommendation.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 27, noes 21.

Mr. STALLINGS. No quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STALLINGS] makes the point of no quorum; the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. PICKLER. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Pending the point of no quorum, the gentleman from South Dakota moves that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. BROOKSHIRE, having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DOCKERY reported that the Committee of the Whole House having had under consideration certain bills on the Private Calendar, the point of "no quorum" was made, and the committee, on motion, determined to rise.

Mr. MARTIN of Indiana. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 10 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

COLUMBIAN SYSTEM OF QUESTION BALLOT AND VOTING.

Mr. PEFFER. I have here a paper which is peculiar in its nature and exceedingly interesting. It is entitled "The Columbian System of Question Ballot and Voting." It is a short treatise on a new system of voting, proposing to use the mails for certain purposes in connection with taking the sense of the people upon particular questions instead of the ballot box, and has for its object the simplifying of our electoral customs and also the saving of expense, and in addition to that the security of secrecy. While I have not examined it all, and while I have not carefully examined much of its phraseology, yet from an interview with its author, I am confident that it would be very interesting to the members of the Senate and to every person for the sake of the philosophy that he gives on the subject of suffrage. I present the paper, and move that it be printed as a miscellaneous document and lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The amendment of the Committee on the District of Columbia was, in line 9, after the word "report," to strike out "thereof" and insert "thereon;" so as to make the bill read:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, line 19, before the word "approval," to insert "the;" so as to read—and should any change be made in the plan of said bridge during the progress of construction, such change shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

BERING SEA AWARD.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the consent of the Senate to put a question to the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], the chairman of of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and as preliminary to it I desire the Secretary to read a dispatch which is in the morning papers.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

SHIPS NOT RECEIVING NOTICE NOT LIABLE.

LONDON, April 6.

Many inquiries have been received here from Canada concerning the status of a vessel under the proposed Bering Sea act in case that vessel shall have proceeded on its sealing voyage before the publication of the act at the port of departure. The exact language of the Bering Sea bill on this point is as follows:

"Where, upon any proceeding against a person and ship in respect of any offense against the act, it is proved that the ship sailed from its port of departure before the scheduled provisions were published there, and that such a person or master of a ship did not, after sailing and before the alleged offense, receive notice of those provisions, such a person shall be acquitted and the ship shall be released and not forfeited."

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Alabama if he has any information whether that dispatch recites correctly the text of the British act of Parliament on that subject? If that be a correct recital, then any sealing vessel which should sail before the passage of the British act and keep out at sea purposely or by design, it seems to me might easily avoid the whole matter for this season, and probably hundreds of thousands of these creatures be destroyed in a single year without any restraint.

It is true that the act requires the shipmaster to show in some way that he had not notice of the provisions of the act, but Canadian sealers had notice of the claim of the United States and had notice of the treaty, so that eight or ten months ago they knew that the two Governments had agreed that there should be some prohibition and limitation of the destruction of these creatures, and were bound to expect legislation in both countries to prevent it.

Therefore, it seems to me that it is a pure evasion of the act and of the treaty to allow a Canadian sealer to be protected in his business for this year by simply showing that when he sailed—it may have been yesterday or a week ago, the whole thing depending on that—he did not know that the British act had actually passed, or what its provisions were. Of course, nobody here would wish to utter any language which would impute a breach of faith to the administration in England which prepared the treaty, but rather that some language has been used the effect of which they did not duly weigh; but if that is to be the whole protection for this season it would seem to me that we need some prompt supplemental legislation and that we should take the matter into our own hands for this season.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts is quite right in his estimate of the danger to the Alaskan seal herds from the attitude which appears to be taken by the British Government in the act to which he refers.

During the last seal-hunting season, when the tribunal was in session at Paris, there was no provision of law and no arrangement between the two Governments by which pelagic hunting in the North Pacific Ocean could be in any way controlled. The tribunal, of course, had no power to make any arrangement or declaration on that branch of the subject. So fur-seal hunting went on without restraint in the North Pacific Ocean last year; and my information is that over 90,000 pelts were taken by the Canadian and other poachers out of those waters, the hunters not going into Bering Sea at all, and that they were worth probably $10 apiece at the time they were taken. If there was 90,000 of them, it is safe to say that involved the destruction of at least 500,000 seals, destroyed by the cruel and exterminating character of that hunting.

During the present season, I am informed by the newspapers, and I think there is some official information in the State Department to the same effect, that about forty or more Canadian sealers have outfitted from Vancouver, Victoria, and perhaps Port Townsend and other places there, and some American sealers have also gone out to raid the fur-seal herds, acting upon the idea that the agreement between the two Governments which was crystallized into an award, which award became an obligation of an international character between the two governments as obligatory as any feature of international law, was not operative or effectual until legislation had occurred in the Congress of the United States, and also in the Parliament of Great Britain, of a concurrent character, to prohibit this pelagic hunting, and also to punish violations of the award.

That view of the subject has never been adopted by the American arbitrators, nor do I understand that it has ever been insisted upon by more than one of the arbitrators composing that tribunal, if by any one. The view taken by the American arbitrators is and was that the award spoke from the moment of its delivery, with full effect in regard to the prohibition which it declared against pelagic hunting, at specified periods, and within certain defined areas; that is to say, as to the area north of the thirty-fifth meridian, up to Bering Straits—that means the Arctic Ocean—and east of the one hundred and eightieth meridian of longitude. The interpretation which the two governments have given to this particular feature of the award as to its obligatory nature from the time of its delivery and the extent and character of that obligation, has not been as yet established perfectly by an agreement between the two governments.

So we must now take our own view of it, and we have to act upon that view so far as may be necessary. I shall not stop now in answering the question put to me by the Senator from Massachusetts, to state my own position in regard to that matter or the reasoning of the state of facts upon which it is founded; it is not necessary that I should do so, but with these preliminary observations I shall now try to answer the question of the Senator from Massachusetts so far as I can.

Some two weeks ago the precise language which the Senator has read, as far as I am now capable of recalling, the substance of it unquestionably, was submitted to the State Department by Sir Julian Pauncefote, that being a part of a general measure which it was proposed to introduce into the Parliament of Great Britain for the enforcement on the part of Great Britain of this award.

There were some other features in the bill also which were even more opposed—I use the phrase with deliberation—to a full and complete and fair execution of this award and treaty upon which it was founded, than that part which the Senator from Massachusetts has just quoted.

Those provisions in that proposed measure of legislation were, as I am informed, distinctly, formally, firmly, and finally rejected by the Secretary of State, and the British Government was so informed. About the time that the information on that subject should have reached London, I saw in the newspapers that the British Government had introduced into Parliament a bill for the purpose of carrying into effect this award.

Of course I did not know, nor do I suppose that even the State Department knew, all of the provisions of that bill, whether it exactly coincided with the programme or formulated bill which Sir Julian Pauncefote had submitted to the inspection of the Secretary of State, but within a day or two after that, perhaps after the bill had passed to its second reading—I do not know now which—that bill was withdrawn from the Parliament by Sir Charles Russell, the attorney-general, who was also one of the counsel before the tribunal of arbitration. I infer from the fact of its having been withdrawn, that the objection stated to it by the United States Government had prevailed, and that it had been withdrawn to be remodeled upon the basis of those objections. I still hope that that is the fact, and that the telegraphic account, which has gotten out in some way, refers to the first proposition of legislation and not to the one which would naturally be in answer to the legislation taken by the Congress of the United States in the last few days, our bill having been completed, I believe, in its passage through the two bodies only on yesterday.

It became necessary, Mr. President, that the Government of the United States should define in a measure of legislation what is its attitude in respect of the enforcement of this award. That attitude was presented correctly and fully in the bill which has just passed the Congress of the United States, and which I suppose is now in the hands of the President for consideration.

It was esteemed by everyone concerned in this business to be a matter of necessity, of propriety, and of duty that the Government of the United States should, without any equivocation, manifest in its legislation its full intent and purpose to carry into effect this award in perfect good faith, and its equal intention, of course, to require from Great Britain a compliance in the same spirit with the duties imposed upon that Government by the award of this tribunal.

In some remarks I had the honor to submit when that bill was introduced here, I mentioned the fact that the state of legislation in the United States was completed by the act passed in 1893. After the Paris tribunal had been agreed upon and appointed and the commissioners were about to set out for the discharge of the duties of that tribunal, an act of Congress was passed for the purpose of placing in full effect all the existing laws of the United States then controlling the subject of fur-seal hunting or fishing in Bering Sea in the area of the North Pacific Ocean, which should be included in such regulations as that tribunal might establish.

Our legislation, it will be remembered, antecedent to the meeting of this tribunal, in respect of Bering Sea had been predicated on the assumption on our part that we had a right to exercise jurisdiction within what we called the dominion of Bering Sea as described in the treaty of cession of 1867 from Russia to the United States; and in the exercise of that right and power of legislation we had prescribed penalties upon all persons, without any regard to nationality, who should go into those waters and there capture seals contrary to our statutes. I need not go into any description of those statutes. Senators will remember what they comprehend and remember also the severe nature of the penalties which attend them; but the act of 1893, to which I have referred, which was passed just before the members of the tribunal went across the water to participate in its labors, provided, as I have pointed out, that in respect of any area of the North Pacific Ocean that might be included within the purview of the award, so as to give to any government a right of jurisdiction there to prohibit fur-seal fishing, the laws of the United States having relation to Bering Sea and controlling fur-seal fishing there should have full application to that area.

Those laws are to be put in force upon a proclamation by the President of the United States; those are the only laws now upon the statute book which authorize the President of the United States to send out fleets of war ships for the purpose of protecting the fur-seal herds and preventing raids upon them. Whatever action is now being taken by the Government of the United States in that regard, is taken in virtue of our own statute, and that action doubtless will not transcend in the slightest degree the limitations which are imposed upon the Government of the United States by the award of the Paris tribunal; but within those limitations, and controlled by those restraints, the power is conferred upon the President of the United States to make arrests and to bring to punishment all persons who may violate those laws.

In the event that Great Britain should pass a statute which we consider to be concurrent and coöperative with the law that we passed the other day and effectual for the purpose of protecting the seal herds, the Government of the United States of course would not attempt to exercise any of the powers which are reserved in our statutes and which are not touched by our recent legislation in respect of the protection of the fur seals.

Of course, the act which was presented to the Secretary of State by Sir Julian Pauncefote is not a full compliance with the terms of that award, and it would scarcely need a suggestion on the part of the United States Government to satisfy Great Britain that such was the fact. But I have not any doubt, and have no reason to doubt, that in the event of a statute of that sort passing the Parliament of Great Britain, as being a compliance with the requirements of that award, the Government of the United States would have to consider what its rights are under the award, or what its rights are in the event that the Government of the United States should regard the concurrent execution of the award as having been abandoned by Great Britain.

That is a ground, of course, Mr. President, which I do not propose to touch upon in any manner that might be considered in the least as going beyond a mere suggestion of my own, for I represent no person but myself in what I now utter upon that question; yet I have not any doubt. I will repeat, that the Government of the United States will find itself in a full state of legal preparation, and animated with a very sincere determination that all the benefits and advantages of that award shall be realized by our Government.

It may be, Mr. President, that we did not get in that award an affirmative declaration of every principle of law for which we had contended, but we got, as I believe—yes, I may say that I am quite sure that we got—all the necessary regulations which are requisite for the protection and preservation of the seal herds, so as that we can go on and realize upon the Pribilof group of islands all the advantages of that seal herd, which naturally belong to us and have been confirmed by the award. Good faith now requires Great Britain to come forward and assist as freely, as fully, as liberally, and as firmly as we have done and intend to insist upon, in the full and perfect completion of this award.

I believe, sir, that is a full answer to the question which has been propounded to me.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Alabama, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations and a member of the International Tribunal at Paris, makes very clear his understanding that the provision to which I have referred, which purports to be an official statement of the actual language of the bill proposed by the Government of Great Britain, allows an entire evasion of the obligation of the award for the present season, and exposes our seal interests to great injury, if not total destruction.

If that be true, and that bill be all that the English Parliament will enact at present, I should be very sorry to leave our interests to the power of the Administration to protect ourselves at once against these sealers, if there be any possible doubt in the mind of the President, or of the Secretary of State, or of the Attorney-General, that the existing legislation is sufficient. I think, therefore, it will be well within the next few days to introduce a measure making the powers of the President clear and distinct in that particular and removing all doubt about it. If it shall turn out that the bill passes the British Parliament in the form now proposed, if nobody else introduces such a measure as I have indicated, I shall introduce one and submit it to the committee of which the Senator from Alabama is chairman.

Mr. GRAY. Before the Senator takes his seat I wish to ask him whether he has any other information on the subject than that contained in the daily newspapers?

Mr. HOAR. No, I have not; but the dispatch which I caused to be read purports to be a verbatim extract from the proposed British law.

Mr. GRAY. I have no doubt that it is, as the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations has suggested, a copy of the bill originally introduced in the British Parliament and objected to by our State Department.

Mr. HOAR. The statement read from the Secretary's desk, I think before the Senator from Delaware came in, is a little more than that. It says that, the Canadians being in doubt as to their rights, a message has been sent to Great Britain to learn the exact terms of the law as it is now proposed, and that they have received, apparently from the Government itself, this information, which purports to be a verbatim extract from the bill introduced in the British Parliament.

Mr. GRAY. I have no doubt that information is as to the bill originally introduced.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed, and the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

VOLUNTEERS IN INDIAN WAR.

The bill (S. 743) for the relief of the citizens of the States of Oregon, Idaho, and Washington who served with the United States troops in the war against the Nez Perces and Bannock Shoshone Indians, and for the relief of the heirs of those killed in such service, and for other purposes, was announced as first in order on the Calendar.

Mr. DOLPH. That bill has been twice read at length and only remains to be voted upon. It simply proposes to pay the State and Territorial troops who were called out at the time of the Nez Perces war and served under Gen. Howard for the number of days they were in the service. It is limited to less than a month to all of them, I think. And where members of the volunteer troop were wounded or killed, they and their heirs are given the benefit of the pension laws. Where they lost horses or arms they are to be compensated for them provided the records of the War Department show the loss. The bill passed the Senate in the last Congress on the same statement. It does not involve a large amount.

Mr. BATE. I think the bill ought not to be taken up now. It will lead to discussion. I think perhaps it had better go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee object to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BATE. The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs after considerable discussion before the committee, and I see that some of the members of that committee, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] particularly, who feel an interest in the bill are not here. I believe it is a bill that will draw forth a good deal of discussion and take some time, and I think it ought not to be considered now.

Mr. DOLPH. The bill has been twice passed over when the Calendar was called, retaining its place. I was absent, and I was told it was passed over on that account. The bill is very short, and it is very simple in its provisions. There is a full report accompanying it; that is to say, there is a report giving the names of the persons who served, the number of days they served, etc.

Mr. BATE. It involves a great deal of money, as the Senator from Oregon knows.

Mr. DOLPH. I think the Senator from Tennessee is mistaken about the bill. This is not the bill proposing to pay the claims of Oregon, California, and Nevada. It is a bill for the relief of the volunteers who served in the Nez Perces war, and it does not involve much money. I will send the report to the Senator.

Mr. BATE. I should like to see it.

Mr. DOLPH. There is a bill for the relief of California, Oregon, and Nevada, which involves a good deal of money, but this is not the bill. This is a different case entirely.

Mr. BATE. I understood this to be the bill to pay the claims of California, Oregon, and Nevada.

Mr. DOLPH. Oh, no; it is not the bill.

Mr. BATE. It seems to bear pretty much the same title as that bill does, and I assumed it to be the same.

Mr. DOLPH. The report contains the names of all the volunteers. I see by it that the number of days served by one company is given as eighteen. It is proposed to pay the men for each day's service and for the loss of animals and guns, if they lost any, and to place upon the pension roll the heirs of those who were killed and wounded in the service, who served under Gen. Howard in the Army of the United States. This is not the bill the Senator from Tennessee referred to.

Mr. BATE. Has the bill ever been before the Committee on Claims?

Mr. DOLPH. No. It was reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. It was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs during the last Congress, and passed by the Senate. It does not involve a large amount of money.

Mr. BATE. Very well; I was mistaken in the bill. The bill I referred to involves an appropriation of a million or two million dollars. I supposed this was the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. Oh, no.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BATE. I withdraw any objection I made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The Chair understands that it has heretofore been read at length.

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill is not long, and I should like to have it read. The title does not convey any idea of the purport of the measure.

Mr. DOLPH. Let the bill be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That each volunteer who joined the forces of the United States from the State of Oregon, or from the Territories of Washington and Idaho, during the wars with the Nez Perces, Bannock, and Shoshone Indians in such Territories and in the Territory of Montana, shall be paid $1 per day during the term of such service, from the time that he left his home until he was returned thereto, including all time spent in hospital under treatment by such as received wounds or other injuries in such service.

SEC. 2. That all persons who were wounded or disabled in such service, and the heirs of all who were killed in such service, shall be entitled to all the benefits of the pension laws, in the same manner and to the same extent as if they had been duly mustered into the regular or volunteer forces of the United States.

SEC. 3. That all horses and arms lost in such service shall be paid for at their actual value: Provided, That no payment shall be made for such losses or for such service as a volunteer except upon the statement of the commanding officer of the United States troops, or such other officer of the regular Army as might be in control of the volunteers at the time of such loss or service, or upon record proof thereof now in the Departments, and such other proofs as may be required to establish the fact that such losses were made in the service of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. I very rarely interfere with matters of this kind coming from the Military Committee or any other committee having charge of them, but I appeal to Senators to reflect a moment until this precedent is examined. It is proposed to pay a dollar a day for troops called into service to protect their own homes more especially, and to extend that pay during all the sickness that may have been caused by their enlistment. Suppose that principle had been applied to the citizens of Ohio in her early period, when our people were out constantly defending themselves and their homes, and so to all the West that was gradually subdued and taken from the hands of the Indians?

It does seem to me that it is a very dangerous bill; but unless some Senators who are familiar with it as members of the Committee on Military Affairs see proper to arrest its passage and consider it further, I do not feel that I can do more than simply enter my protest. I can not vote for such a bill.

Mr. DOLPH. Such volunteers have been paid in every State in the Union where there are Indians, and some of them have been paid more than $1 a day. In the first place, I see here that no officer or member of one company served over eighteen days. As Gen. Howard passed through with the troops after the outbreak of the war, they were never in Oregon at all. There are very few Oregon people who are beneficiaries of the bill. These people joined the army and put themselves under Gen. Howard. They took their horses and their arms and helped him to follow the Indians across the continent until they were met by Gen. Miles and captured. In the report there is a statement of every man and every officer who performed service, the number of days he served, the number of horses that were lost, and every detail from the records in the War Department.

I undertake to say that Ohio has been reimbursed every dollar she expended for suppressing savage insurrection, and almost every other State in the Union has been reimbursed. This is in the line of legislation that has prevailed for a hundred years.

The bill has been examined twice by the Committee on Military Affairs, and it was reported at the present session by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS]. It is but a small acknowledgment of the debt the people of the United States owe to those people who risked their lives and joined the service of the United States to suppress this Indian outbreak.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon what committee reported the bill?

Mr. DOLPH. The Committee on Military Affairs reported it at the present Congress and at the last Congress. It passed the Senate during the last Congress. I will send to the Senator from Tennessee the report, which will show him the name of every volunteer, the number of days of service, and everything else that could be added to give full information on the subject.

Mr. HARRIS. I wish to ask the Senator from Oregon if the bill does not also make pensionable a class of persons who are not pensionable under any law of the United States?

Mr. DOLPH. That question can be answered in two ways. It does make pensionable a class of persons who were wounded in this service.

Mr. HARRIS. Without regard to the length of service?

Mr. DOLPH. Without regard to the length of service. But that has been done in regard to other Indian wars. This Indian war occurred in 1878. I believe all persons who served in Indian wars down to 1855 are entitled to the benefit of the pension laws.

The bill does not pension anybody for service. It pensions merely for disability on account of wounds.

Mr. HARRIS. And the dependents of persons who served.

Mr. DOLPH. Yes; the heirs of those who were killed. As I remember, all persons who served in Indian wars to 1855 are entitled to the benefit of the pension laws, and therefore I may say the bill does not pension a new class.

Mr. HARRIS. Is that done by general law or by special act?

Mr. DOLPH. It is now a part of the statutes of the United States.

Mr. HARRIS. I should rather have the bill go over for the present, so that we may look at it a little more carefully than we can do at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the present consideration of the bill, and it goes over.

Mr. DOLPH. The bill has been thoroughly examined by the committee, and the report is here. I ask to have the report printed in the RECORD. I wish Senators to have an opportunity to see it.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to that being done, if the Senator from Oregon desires it.

Mr. DOLPH. Let the report be printed, so that Senators may be informed about it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The report (submitted by Mr. MANDERSON, on behalf of Mr. DAVIS, December 14, 1893) is as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 743) for the relief of the citizens of the States of Oregon, Idaho, and Washington, who served with the United States troops in the war against the Nez Perces and Bannock and Shoshone Indians, and for the relief of the heirs of those killed in such service, having duly considered the same, respectfully report:

This bill is identical in terms with the amended bill before the committee at the last Congress, and which, as amended, received the favorable report of the committee. That report, hereto annexed, is readopted and the passage of the bill is recommended.

Senate Report No. 559, first session Fifty-second Congress.

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 876) for the relief of the citizens of the States of Oregon, Idaho, and Washington, who served with the United States troops in the war against the Nez Perces, Bannock, and Shoshone Indians, and for the relief of the heirs of those killed in such service, and for other purposes, having duly considered the same, respectfully report:

A bill similar in its provisions was introduced in the Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, and Fiftieth Congresses, but no action by Congress seems to have been taken thereon.

The object of this bill is to provide compensation for those persons who performed military service in conjunction with the United States troops during the Nez Perces, Bannock, and Shoshone Indian wars in Oregon, Washington, and Idaho in 1877-'78, who furnished supplies to said troops, who lost horses therein, who were wounded, and for the heirs of those who were killed in battle.

The act of Congress approved March 3, 1881 (United States Statutes, volume 21, page 611), provided for the relief only of those citizens of Montana who served in conjunction with the United States troops in the wars of 1877-'78 with the Nez Perces, no provision being made therein for citizens of Oregon, Washington, and Idaho who served in the same wars.

From sundry correspondence, attached to and submitted with this report, it will be seen that the volunteers provided for in the bill now under consideration served with the regular troops of the United States Army, under the command of Gen. O. O. Howard, United States Army, in said wars, and the omission to provide for them in the Montana act must have been an oversight. The amended bill herewith reported seeks to do equal justice to those volunteers not included or provided for in said act, and thus place them all on an equal footing.

The bill as introduced, however, gives to the beneficiaries a much greater measure of relief than was afforded to the Montana volunteers by the act above referred to. Your committee recommend that the bill be amended by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following:

"That each volunteer who joined the forces of the United States from the State of Oregon or from the Territories of Washington and Idaho during the wars with the Nez Perces, Bannock, and Shohone Indians in such Territories and the Territory of Montana, shall be paid $1 per day during the term of such service, from the time that he left his home until he was returned thereto, including all time spent in hospital under treatment by such as received wounds or other injuries in such service."

SEC. 2. That all persons who were wounded or disabled in such service, and the heirs of all who were killed in such service, shall be entitled to all the benefits of the pension laws, in the same manner and to the same extent as if they had been duly mustered into the regular or volunteer forces of the United States.

SEC. 3. That all horses and arms lost in such service shall be paid for at their actual value: Provided, That no payment shall be made for such losses or for such services as a volunteer except upon the statement of the commanding officer of the United States troops, or such other officer of the regular Army as might be in control of the volunteers at the time of such loss or service, or upon record proof thereof now in the Departments and such other proofs as may be required, to establish the fact that such losses were made in the service of the United States.

This amendment is substantially the same with the act of 1881 for the relief of the Montana volunteers, except that in this act the Bannock and Shoshone wars are named in addition to the war with the Nez Perces.

The committee recommend the passage of the bill as amended.

WAR DEPARTMENT, Washington, March 26, 1890.

SIR: I return herewith Senate bill 87, "For the relief of the citizens of the State of Oregon and the Territories of Idaho and Washington who served with the United States troops in the war against the Nez Perces and Bannock and Shoshone Indians, and for the relief of the heirs of those killed in such service, and for other purposes," which was referred to this Department by your indorsement of the 7th instant, and invite your attention to the inclosed reports of the Adjutant-General, dated the 22d instant, and of the officer in charge of the Record and Pension Division of this office, submitting the lists of such citizen volunteers from Oregon, Idaho, and Washington who performed military services during the Nez Perce, Bannock, and Shoshone Indian wars of 1877 and 1878.

In view of the many calls upon this Department for the information herewith furnished, I recommend that these papers be printed.

Very respectfully,

Mr. MORGAN. I can not withdraw the motion for that purpose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three hours and two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 23 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 9, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. SICKLES for three days, on account of sickness.

SUMMONING OF ABSENT MEMBERS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House a report from the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE SERGEANT-AT-ARMS, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., April 2, 1894.

SIR: I report herewith my action under warrant of the House of Representatives, dated March 29, 1894.

The absentees were all summoned by telegrams except those known to be in the city, and those sick and excused.

The following have been present in their seats:

Mr. NEWLANDS, Mr. SPERRY, Mr. DAVEY, Mr. WALKER, Mr. BERRY, Mr. MOON, Mr. SHERMAN.

The following are sick or excused:

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, Mr. LISLE, Mr. SIMPSON, Mr. RANDALL, Mr. HEARD, Mr. BINGHAM.

The following are reported as on their way to this city:

Mr. FITHIAN, Mr. MCDOWELL.

The following are still absent, some of whom are reported away from home, and others have not responded to telegrams:

Mr. ALDRICH, Mr. ARNOLD, Mr. DOLLIVER, Mr. JOHNSON of Ohio, Mr. LUCAS, Mr. SCRANTON, Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York, Mr. CALDWELL, Mr. HOUK, Mr. LINTON, Mr. SNODGRASS, Mr. STORER, Mr. WRIGHT of Massachusetts.

Respectfully submitted,

H. W. SNOW,
Sergeant-at-Arms, House of Representatives.

Hon. CHARLES F. CRISP,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. REED. I would like to ask, Mr. Speaker, if the Sergeant-at-Arms has obeyed the orders of the House directing him to take into custody absent members?

The SPEAKER. He has made a report.

Mr. REED. I came in as it was being read, and would be glad to know if the Sergeant-at-Arms reports that he has taken any members into custody?

The SPEAKER. The report speaks for itself.

Mr. REED. Will the Chair cause the Clerk to read it again?

The SPEAKER. It has just been read.

Mr. REED. I ask unanimous consent that it be again read.

Mr. STALLINGS. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that all further proceedings under this order be terminated.

Mr. STALLINGS. I will not insist upon the objection to the reading.

The SPEAKER. Objection being withdrawn, the Clerk will again read the report from the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The report was again read.

Mr. REED. Is there any statement of fees there; any further statement in connection with the enforcement of the order?

The SPEAKER. That is the whole report.

Mr. REED. Then a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. REED. Does that discharge the order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would require some further order of the House to do that.

Mr. REED. And we are still operating under the former order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so, and that an order of the House will be necessary to terminate it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the order.

The question was taken: and on a division (demanded by Mr. REED) there were—ayes 62, noes 0.

Mr. REED. No quorum.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will withdraw the motion, then.

Mr. REED. Can it be withdrawn in the present situation?

Mr. SPRINGER. I think so. No action has been taken upon it.

The SPEAKER. But the House has just voted upon it.

Mr. SPRINGER. But no quorum voted, and no action was taken.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it can not be withdrawn without consent.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I will insist on the motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine makes the point that no quorum has voted, and the Chair will order tellers.

Mr. REED and Mr. SPRINGER were appointed tellers.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that it does not require a quorum to adopt the motion proposed by the gentleman from Illinois. This is a proceeding under a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The House is not now in call, and the House of course can not do any business without a quorum.

Mr. KILGORE. Still, this is disposing of business that was inaugurated without a quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would require a quorum to pass the order. The tellers will please take their places.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 85, noes none.

Mr. REED. No quorum.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 132, nays 7, not voting 214; as follows:

SENATE.

MONDAY, April 9, 1894.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

SENATOR FROM GEORGIA.

Mr. GORDON presented the credentials of Patrick Walsh, appointed by the Governor of Georgia a Senator from that State to fill, until the next meeting of the Legislature thereof, the vacancy in the term ending March 3, 1895, occasioned by the death of Alfred H. Colquitt; which were read, as follows:

STATE OF GEORGIA.

By His Excellency W. J. Northen, governor of said State.

To the Hon. PATRICK WALSH, greeting:

Whereas, by the death of the Hon. Alfred A. Colquitt, a vacancy exists in the representation of this State in the Senate of the United States; and

Whereas, in conformity with the Constitution of the United States, you have this day been appointed a Senator of Georgia, to fill the vacancy aforesaid until the next meeting of the General Assembly of this State:

These are therefore to commission you, the said Patrick Walsh, to take immediate session in the Senate of the United States, as a Senator of Georgia, in place of the said Alfred H. Colquitt, deceased, and to use and exercise all and every the privileges and powers which of right you may or can do in and by virtue of the Constitution of the United States in behalf of this State.

This commission to continue of force until the next meeting of the General Assembly of the State of Georgia.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State, at the capitol, in Atlanta, this the 2d day of April, in the year of our Lord 1894, and of American Independence the one hundred and eighteenth.

[SEAL.] W. J. NORTHEN, Governor.

By the governor:

PHILIP COOK, Secretary of State.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The credentials will be placed on file.

Mr. GORDON. The Senator appointed is present, and I ask that he be now sworn in.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator appointed will please come forward and receive the oath of office.

Mr. Walsh was escorted to the Vice-President's desk by Mr. GORDON, and the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him, he took his seat in the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to make a suggestion before the credentials go on file. I have no doubt whatever of the due appointment of the Senator who has just taken the oath, but it seems very desirable indeed that the State authorities should conform to the forms which have become the custom of the Senate, and which have been repeatedly held to be valid. Otherwise, when the Senate is organized at the beginning of a Congress in times of party heat and excitement there are likely to grow up uncomfortable questions which will delay and interfere with Senators in entering upon their office.

These credentials are not even addressed to the Senate of the United States, and they are not at all in the accustomed form. Some little while ago a form was prepared by the Secretary of the Senate and sent to the various State executives, and that form has since been very generally adopted. I have no objection to the credentials being filed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts submits no motion, the Chair understands.

Mr. HOAR. No, sir.

INDIAN AGENCIES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the Senate of the 28th ultimo, a letter from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, giving the names of all Indian agents, the compensation of each, his location, and the number of Indians at each agency, etc.: which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

COINAGE OF STANDARD MEXICAN DOLLARS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], coming over from a previous day.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. WOLCOTT on the 2d instant, as follows:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States with a view to encourage and extend our commercial relations with China and other Asiatic countries, be requested to enter into negotiations with the Republic of Mexico, looking to the coinage by the United States, at its mints, of standard Mexican dollars, under some proper agreement with the said Republic of Mexico as to seigniorage, method and amount of said coinage; and that he be further requested to report the result of his negotiations to the Senate."

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, when this resolution first came up for hearing it was unavoidably crowded over. I was necessarily detained from the Senate on Friday last when the resolution came up again in due course, and the remarks made by my colleague [Mr. TELLER] and others leave but little to say upon this question. There are, however, a few suggestions which I desire to make.

The resolution does not in the slightest degree touch or affect the general question of bimetallism. It is simply a suggestion to a friendly sister republic that our idle mints in the West might be utilized upon fair terms for the coinage of the only dollars which have secured the confidence of the Orient as the medium of commercial exchange, to the advantage and profit of the three different nations concerned. If the seigniorage bill had become a law this resolution could not have been introduced, because our idle mints would have been busy. The veto of the seigniorage bill leaves us free to act.

While the seigniorage bill was utterly unimportant the lessons of its veto are many. It was unimportant because the only end it could hope to accomplish in the interest of bimetallism was the coinage into dollars of the idle bullion now lying in the Treasury. It has been claimed by European countries that the vast mass of bullion in the Treasury of the United States might at any time be dumped by this country upon Europe, and therefore that it stood as a bar and an obstacle to the shaping of the silver question upon some renewed basis looking to international bimetallism.

The seigniorage bill proposed further to provide for this country some $55,000,000 or more of adequate good, lawful money, which a great many people of the country thought would be better to meet the gap caused by the impending deficit than that money should be borrowed by the people of the United States and interest paid upon it.

Although, however, the measure was unimportant, yet its veto left a deep impress upon the country, and has shown in a clear light the position of the different sections of the country respecting our financial policy. Last summer in this Chamber and in another, members rose in their places and declared their undying faith in the friendship of the President of the United States for silver.

We were told by Senators upon this floor, including members of the Finance Committee, that as soon as the infamous Sherman act should be brushed aside, the first moment would be utilized in reintroducing a bill for the free and unlimited coinage of silver, for which the President of the United States would undoubtedly stand as sponsor. That position has been somewhat cleared. If any one thing has been made by this veto clear to the minds of the people of the United States, it is that its Chief Executive is the consistent and implacable and eager enemy of silver. He has been consistent throughout, and he has had the courage of the convictions of the national banks and the trust companies of the United States, to all of which the name of silver is a stench and an offense.

The veto has further shown us that the silver sentiment of the country is local and not political. In the New England States and in the Northeast both parties have vied with each other in adulation and praise of the President's action, while in the rest of the country the veto has been viewed with sorrow and with indignation. In the New England States and in the Northeast the unanimous feeling is that the President of the United States is infinitely better than his party. So universal is this the prevailing sentiment that the Democracy of that section apparently intend to indorse the openly expressed contempt of the President of the United States for the Democratic party at large by voting overwhelmingly in favor of the Republican ticket; while in the West and South, irrespective of party, there is a prevailing and a unanimous sentiment that the President of the United States has betrayed not only the platform of his party but the interests of his people, and that he has treated the just claims of those great States of the Union, which are devoted to mining and to agriculture, which are borrowers and not lenders, with scorn and with derision.

The veto has further taught us that during the incumbency of the present Executive there is no hope whatever for the cause of bimetallism. And the self-respect of those of us who believe that the day of prosperity will never come to this country again until silver is rehabilitated and restored to its place as a money metal should require of us that we advocate and vote for no makeshift and no temporary expedient. If the lesson is to be learned it may as well be learned during the present Administration as at any other time; and we owe it to our own dignity, and the respect due the cause, that we oppose upon this floor every measure which does not follow upon the lines of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 15½ or 16 to 1.

I speak especially for those of us who believe that the United States alone can undertake and maintain the double standard. There have lately arisen in the Eastern States a number of bimetallic leagues and societies, which in their way are doing an infinite amount of good. They are educating the people to believe that the welfare and the prosperity of the world must hereafter rest upon the use of silver as well as gold. They are of no immediate benefit to us who believe that the United States alone could maintain the double standard, and in a way they are an enemy within our gates. But the lessons they are imparting, the beliefs that they are inculcating that prosperity will never return until silver is restored as a standard of value is doing an infinite amount of good throughout this country; and for one, I am ready to say to them that during the present unfortunate Administration we do not propose to advocate or vote for any half-hearted measure which does not reach the principle of bimetallism, and which does not look to the reëstablishment and the reinstatement of silver as a standard of value equally with its sister metal.

Whatever may happen, Mr. President, we want no further dallying with so-called seigniorage bills. We have been lately told through the public press that in another Chamber a measure has been introduced which shall reconcile all parties, which shall convince their silver-loving constituents at home that its advocates are at heart the friends of silver, which shall couple with seigniorage that grotesque suggestion of the President in his veto message, that if the Congress of the United States would let the Government borrow what money it wanted on its interest-bearing bonds, then the country could afford a further issue of silver money which requires no redemption, except silver itself.

Such a suggestion, Mr. President, is too paltry to be fairly considered. If we are to have bonds, let us meet a bond issue like men. I for one need no sop thrown to me of a seigniorage bill in consideration that I shall give the Secretary of the Treasury my vote to issue unlimited bonds to meet unknown and uncertain deficits. We will cross that stream when we reach it.

This resolution, then, is not introduced because it has any relation whatever with the future of the silver question in the United States. It has no sort of connection with the great principle of bimetallism.

China, like all other nations doing business on a silver basis, and owing no debts the principal and interest of which are payable in gold, is in a most prosperous and happy condition, with a rapidly increasing commerce and largely increasing exports. There has not been a period in the history of that nation when its internal affairs and its foreign commerce were in as good a condition as now. That condition has been largely facilitated by the attitude of Great Britain toward India, to which I shall hereafter refer, but it is a fact that the trade of China, internal and with the outer world, was never as prosperous as now.

That country, with its population of upwards of 400,000,000, is dominated by precedent; its methods of agriculture, of manufacture, and of transportation have remained unchanged through all the centuries. When she first opened her ports unwillingly to foreign nations the Mexican dollar was adopted as the standard of value and its adoption has remained unchanged. Almost every other nation of the world has endeavored to introduce its dollars in competition with the Mexican dollar, and has failed.

The English Government for a time, at Hongkong, started the coinage of a British dollar, and coined some 10,000,000 of them. Some of them were used in circulation, some of them as buttons, as bangles, and as ornaments; but they made no general impress upon the country, and their coinage was withdrawn.

The French nation commenced the coinage of a dollar with which to transact its commercial business with China, but it was compelled to withdraw it.

The Japanese Government now coins its yen, with not quite so much silver in it as had the Mexican dollar. It has also something of a circulation, but an extremely limited circulation, in China.

Our trade dollar, of which we issued some $35,000,000, never became general in use throughout the Chinese Empire.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] inadvertently made a suggestion the other day which is not in accordance with the fact, that the Chinese Government stamped the "yen" upon the coin, and it then became currency. The "yen" is the name of the Japanese coin. It was the custom at the time our trade dollar was introduced in China for each business house receiving a dollar to stamp its "chop" or business mark or device upon the dollar, and then it would circulate to the next business house, which, in turn, would stamp its "chop" or mark upon it.

After circulating a few times, it would become defaced, disfigured, and light in weight, when it would be rejected by the banks, and after its rejection by the banks it would be coined into bullion. The bullion afterwards found its way into India or was hoarded, as was the custom in those years, as among the assets of the retiring Chinese merchants who were in the habit of running their silver into bullion and preserving it as part of their treasure or assets or fortune, but in all these attempts nothing has taken the place of the Mexican dollar. The Mexican Government started to change the emblem on its dollar, but that change was unacceptable to the Chinese Government, and the old Mexican dollar still stands as the sandard of circulation in that country.

Disraeli has said that every precedent embalmed a principle; and it may be, Mr. President, that back of this precedent, which seems to us meaningless, the fact that while other countries coined a dollar for foreign circulation only, the Mexican Government has issued to China no dollar which it repudiates at home, may have had much to do with the fact that the Mexican dollar has remained the standard. This Mexican dollar is a dollar of 377 grains fine, known as the dollar marked with the cactus, the eagle, and snake.

To meet this universal demand, the Mexican mints are more than overcrowded. The Mexican Government charges a seigniorage of 4.40 per cent on every dollar which it coins. It charges an export duty of 2 per cent on all silver exported from the country. So that those producing silver in Mexico must either coin their silver at the mints of Mexico and pay its Government 4.40 per cent, or they must pay the Government 2 per cent duty for exporting it.

The Republic of Mexico produces some $50,000,000 annually in silver. Of this amount some $5,000,000 or more are exported in bullion in small amounts to meet the local demands of trade and commerce. Some $20,000,000 of the product of Mexico goes in matte to the great refineries of Swansea, in England, and is there coined.

It is within my memory, Mr. President, when no dollar of silver was ever produced in this country to any commercial extent. Since that time, in the last twenty years, we have built our refineries, our smelting works; we have adopted different processes, and we now smelt our silver into bullion, but $20,000,000 of the product of Mexico still goes to England in the form of matte.

The capacity of the Mexican mints is but twenty-five to twenty-six million dollars. Of this amount of twenty-five or twenty-six million dollars but $1,000,000 stays in the Republic of Mexico; all the rest of it is exported. The exportation is almost entirely to Japan, India, and other parts of Asia. Of this export about $7,500,000 on an average for the last ten years goes by way of San Francisco, a little less amount goes by way of England, from Liverpool and London, direct to Asia and the rest of it probably goes abroad in the pockets of returning Chinamen or through Chilean or Peruvian ports. Of the amount that is coined there is already, owing to this demand, not only a scarcity of Mexican dollars, but a scarcity of silver in Mexico for coinage purposes. I saw in one of yesterday's newspapers, the New York Tribune, I believe it was, a telegram from Boston saying:

> A dispatch to the Herald from the City of Mexico says: "Silver bars refined in the United States from Mexican ore are arriving here for coinage into dollars. Eighty-eight bars have been received, and more are expected. German bullion dealers are talking of sending bar silver here for the same purpose, owing to the increasing demand for Mexican dollars in China, where a scanty supply has hindered trade operations."

The fact that the supply is insufficient is shown not only by the importation of silver into Mexico for the purpose of being coined, but it is also shown by the fact that certain quantities, not large, of bullion are exported to China.

We hear much of Chinese mints. There is a mint at Shanghai known as the Royal Chinese Mint. Its business, its surroundings are all shrouded in the greatest mystery. It is in the hands of local mandarins under some contract with the Government. Our consul made a report upon it last year. The only information he could obtain was that there were coined in the mint about 3,000,000 ounces of silver, and out of that amount there were 19,000,000 ten-cent pieces, which were utilized principally by the natives as buttons. The coinage of the Chinese mint, however, amounts practically to nothing.

China produces no silver. This bullion goes to China because there are not Mexican dollars enough to do the business, and it is from the fact that Mexican dollars in London and in New York bring a premium from a half per cent to 3 per cent; that the demand is for the Mexican dollar, and the supply is insufficient. The effect of the enlargement of the facilities of Mexico in the coinage of its dollars must be to enlarge our commerce as well as to facilitate the world's commerce with China.

Mr. HIGGINS. Will the Senator answer a question at that point?

Mr. WOLCOTT. With pleasure.

Mr. HIGGINS. I ask if the premium on Mexican dollars is not owing to the Chinese demand?

Mr. WOLCOTT. It is owing to the Chinese demand—not the Indian, but the Asiatic demand for dollars.

Mr. HIGGINS. They are not to be used in this country?

Mr. WOLCOTT. They are wholly for shipment to Asia.

Our commerce with China is already great. Our exports to China last year were $3,900,000; our imports were upwards of $20,000,000; of which sum $5,000,000 were dutiable and some $15,000,000 were free.

If these dollars shall be coined at our mints at Carson City and at San Francisco, it will create something of an active silver market on the Pacific coast, and where the dollars are the facilities for shipment and commerce will go also. There will be a demand for these dollars from London merchants and from English and from Scotch merchants. They will send gold to this country in exchange for the dollars which will be shipped direct, and it will add much to the steamship commerce between the Pacific coast and Asia. Many of these dollars will find their way into the Indian market. They are handy; they will go up country be remelted and made into bangles and ornaments. There is always a certain demand in India also for Mexican dollars.

The total commerce of China has of late years assumed enormous importance. Her foreign commerce last year consisted of £27,000,000 of imports and £25,000,000 of exports. These exports are rapidly increasing in volume and in value and are very much facilitated, as I have said, by the action of England toward her colonies in India.

The attitude of Great Britain is most pregnant with interest in this country, for no matter what may be our legislation, the attitude of Great Britain toward India, the prices at which her wheat and jute and cotton are to be sold, the facilities of the exchange into English money, must ever materially affect the prices of those products in this country which we raise in competition with that great people.

The silver difficulty in India which has followed from the closing of the Indian mints is of this nature: The Indian government collects its revenue in silver rupees; the revenue collected since last June and remaining in the treasury amounts to some 20 crores of rupees—in other words, to some 80,000,000 ounces of silver. There are some 4,000,000 ounces to the crore. The crore is an East Indian word signifying 10,000,000, and 10,000,000 rupees mean something over 4,000,000 ounces of silver. These 80,000,000 ounces of silver are now locked up in the English treasury in India, making a scarcity of actual rupees for commerce in India.

Now, the demand for these rupees, through sales of so-called "council drafts" in London, is the demand of English importers of Indian wheat, cotton, and jute, who require silver rupees to pay for their purchases from Indian farmers. But the government of India by closing the mints has said: "You can not any longer pay rupees by buying silver from America or elsewhere and coining it in Bombay, therefore you must now buy these rupees from our government treasuries, and at whatever price we fix. True, the value of the silver in the rupee is now only 22 cents per rupee, but we will not sell our coins, our council drafts, for less than 28 cents per rupee; either take them at that price or leave and go out of business." This result has followed from this policy of coercion. China, for example, is getting silver—is getting Mexican dollars—for what she sells in Europe at their bullion value, but the Indian exporter is finding that the present artificially high price charged by the govern-

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

COINAGE OF STANDARD MEXICAN DOLLARS.

The only information he could obtain was that there were coined in the mint about 3,000,000 ounces of silver, and out of that amount there were 19,000,000 ten-cent pieces, which were utilized principally by the natives as buttons. The coinage of the Chinese mint, however, amounts practically to nothing.

China produces no silver. This bullion goes to China because there are not Mexican dollars enough to do the business, and it is from the fact that Mexican dollars in London and in New York bring a premium from a half per cent to 3 per cent; that the demand is for the Mexican dollar, and the supply is insufficient. The effect of the enlargement of the facilities of Mexico in the coinage of its dollars must be to enlarge our commerce as well as to facilitate the world's commerce with China.

Mr. HIGGINS. Will the Senator answer a question at that point?

Mr. WOLCOTT. With pleasure.

Mr. HIGGINS. I ask if the premium on Mexican dollars is not owing to the Chinese demand?

Mr. WOLCOTT. It is owing to the Chinese demand—not the Indian, but the Asiatic demand for dollars.

Mr. HIGGINS. They are not to be used in this country?

Mr. WOLCOTT. They are wholly for shipment to Asia.

Our commerce with China is already great. Our exports to China last year were $3,900,000; our imports were upwards of $20,000,000; of which sum $5,000,000 were dutiable and some $15,000,000 were free.

If these dollars shall be coined at our mints at Carson City and at San Francisco, it will create something of an active silver market on the Pacific coast, and where the dollars are the facilities for shipment and commerce will go also. There will be a demand for these dollars from London merchants and from English and from Scotch merchants. They will send gold to this country in exchange for the dollars which will be shipped direct, and it will add much to the steamship commerce between the Pacific coast and Asia. Many of these dollars will find their way into the Indian market. They are handy; they will go up country be remelted and made into bangles and ornaments. There is always a certain demand in India also for Mexican dollars.

The total commerce of China has of late years assumed enormous importance. Her foreign commerce last year consisted of £27,000,000 of imports and £25,000,000 of exports. These exports are rapidly increasing in volume and in value and are very much facilitated, as I have said, by the action of England toward her colonies in India.

The attitude of Great Britain is most pregnant with interest in this country, for no matter what may be our legislation, the attitude of Great Britain toward India, the prices at which her wheat and jute and cotton are to be sold, the facilities of the exchange into English money, must ever materially affect the prices of those products in this country which we raise in competition with that great people.

The silver difficulty in India which has followed from the closing of the Indian mints is of this nature: The Indian government collects its revenue in silver rupees; the revenue collected since last June and remaining in the treasury amounts to some 20 crores of rupees—in other words, to some 80,000,000 ounces of silver. There are some 4,000,000 ounces to the crore. The crore is an East Indian word signifying 10,000,000, and 10,000,000 rupees mean something over 4,000,000 ounces of silver. These 80,000,000 ounces of silver are now locked up in the English treasury in India, making a scarcity of actual rupees for commerce in India.

Now, the demand for these rupees, through sales of so-called "council drafts" in London, is the demand of English importers of Indian wheat, cotton, and jute, who require silver rupees to pay for their purchases from Indian farmers. But the government of India by closing the mints has said: "You can not any longer pay rupees by buying silver from America or elsewhere and coining it in Bombay, therefore you must now buy these rupees from our government treasuries, and at whatever price we fix. True, the value of the silver in the rupee is now only 22 cents per rupee, but we will not sell our coins, our council drafts, for less than 28 cents per rupee; either take them at that price or leave and go out of business." This result has followed from this policy of coercion. China, for example, is getting silver—is getting Mexican dollars—for what she sells in Europe at their bullion value, but the Indian exporter is finding that the present artificially high price charged by the government of India for the rupee is giving the China exporter a great advantage he never got before.

Let me illustrate this point carefully. In India the government has fixed the value of the rupee at 28 cents, while the value of a corresponding weight of silver in China, say two-fifths of an ounce, is 22 cents. Now, if we suppose 1 pound of tea in India costs 1 rupee, then the Indian grower can sell some 17 pounds of tea for the gold sovereign. But the Chinaman can afford to sell 23 pounds of tea for the sovereign. As this argument applies to most of India's exports, the balance of trade since the closing of the mints has gone strongly against India, and is greatly favoring China; and just as the rise in the Indian rates of exchange and the fall in the China rates has thrown the balance of trade against India and is favoring China, so also the fall in the rate of exchange between the silver-using countries and Europe since 1873 has tended to destroy our favorable balance of trade with gold-using Europe, by stimulating the trade in wheat and cotton from Asia at the expense of our exports of these staples.

So, following this, I desire to call the attention of the Senate briefly to an Indian opinion as to the effect which is being produced in India by the floundering policy of the English Government towards India. I read very briefly from some recent remarks by Hon. Robert Steel, who is the commercial member of the viceroy's council in India. In an address which he delivered at the meeting of the Bengal Chamber of Commerce he says:

> We may now judge of the result of the closing of the mints. The secretary of state can not sell his council bills. The balance of trade has disappeared. Exchange is falling, and there seems to be no chance of the downward course being arrested until we reach the metallic value of the rupee. Money is at 9 per cent, and may go much higher, but the exchange banks, in view of the further expected fall in exchange, will not bring out one rupee more than the amount they absolutely require to pay for the bills they have bought. By the presence of dear money and the prospect of still dearer money trade is paralyzed. The fact is that the action of government in closing the mints has caused silver to fall to a lower point than it otherwise would have done, and yet it appears that whether the mints be closed or open there is no chance that council bills can be sold on the scale of our requirements until exchange reaches the bullion point.
> Our trade is paralyzed in the hope of relieving the embarrassments of government, and yet the departure from a sound currency system is making the position of government worse than it was before. The present course can not be persevered in long. We can not go on borrowing gold and heaping up money in our treasuries here The day of reckoning must come, and can not be far off. We find English statesmen are already pressing the unanswerable charge that the Indian Government has entered into a gigantic speculation in silver. This is serious enough in itself, but when it appears that the speculation is certain to be a losing one, the clamor against it will be irresistible. What then must be done? We are, perhaps, on the eve of a crisis which may give a terrible shock to industry, to commerce, and to credit. We can not prosper without a sound currency acting automatically. Let us open our mints, and we shall again see a wave of prosperity flowing over the land like that which followed in gold-using countries the discoveries of gold in California and Australia fifty years ago.

This, Mr. President, is an intelligent Indian opinion of the present policy which Great Britain is following towards India. She is animated naturally by her own selfish interest.

The products of India and the products of China are much alike, and whatever we can do to upbuild the commerce of Asia at the expense of the commerce of India must be to our advantage as showing England where her interests lie.

We are met with the threat that England may sell her silver bullion on hand. It has been recently suggested by the English press that the 20 crores of bullion, or the 80,000,000 ounces of silver, which England has on hand in India may be sold. If that unfortunate occurrence should take place, there is no doubt that the price of silver would be further depreciated; there is no doubt that it would add to the already untold disasters which have overtaken the world because of the abandonment of silver; but I venture the prediction that England will never take that step, for when she does that she makes valueless hundreds and thousands of millions of dollars of bonds, the principal and interest of which are payable in gold, which silver-using countries have borrowed of her. Let her sell her silver on hand in India and add another attempt to degrade the metal, and you will find every silver-using country on earth repudiate every gold payment it owes; and 90 per cent of those payments are due to Great Britain.

The question of the production of silver is not to be settled by Great Britain and by this country by selling silver in bulk, or by attempting to further degrade and dishonor it. Many of us have taken the position here on the floor of the Senate for years, that even if we rehabilitated silver and restored the old free coinage at the ratio of 16 to 1, the production of silver would not be increased. We have said that the rise in prices, the rise in wages, the limited and narrowing area for the discovery and development of silver mines, would prevent in any event the further and larger development and output of silver ores. But, Mr. President, there has lately been borne in upon us a different condition of facts.

We now face another proposition. Every one of these estimates has been based upon the assumption that silver alone depreciated. But one lesson that we are painfully and slowly, but surely, learning to-day, is that not only has the price of silver depreciated or the price of gold appreciated, but that wages are decreasing, that the cost of the necessaries of life is decreasing, that the food the miner eats and the clothes he wears are growing less in cost, that the cost of machinery for the development of mines is less, that the cost of making roads is less, that the traffic upon the railroads will bear less, and out of the misery of it all there must come the inevitable fact that as silver declines in value, so men with mouths to feed will be found to produce it for less wages.

Our furnaces are cold, our fires are out, our mines are most of them closed; those which are kept open are kept open in order to prevent the timbers from rotting and the waters from flooding the mines; yet when these miners—intelligent men who have up to this time found work at prices which remunerated them and enabled them to add to the glory of American manhood, to educate their children, to feed them and to own their own homes—find that the monetary policy of this country prevents their receiving these wages, and that it is starvation or nothing, we shall inevitably find that silver will continue to be produced at some price.

Great Britain, with the United States attending upon its policy, seems willing to destroy four thousand millions of existing silver coinage in order that it may prevent the output of about one hundred millions of silver a year available for coinage. They are waiting for a river to run by that will be fed by the eternal spring of man's necessities. As you degrade silver you degrade American manhood, American wages, American labor, American prices; but you will find that silver will continue to be produced as long as that metal is found within the bowels of mother earth.

This resolution, Mr. President, may come to nothing, but it is worth the trying, and out of the general impoverishment and stagnation which prevail throughout this country, I, for one, am glad to seek even some small measure of relief from countries whose faith in silver has never wavered, and whose people are prosperous and happy, because they have clung to the white metal through evil as well as through good report.

If no other Senator desires to speak to the resolution, I trust it may be put upon its passage.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I do not intend to participate in any debate on this question, because I am inclined to think that the passage of the resolution and the undertaking by the President of the United States to negotiate some measure of relief to silver would be at this time a wise measure to pass. I certainly would favor any proposition which would tend to give silver a larger use for commercial or financial purposes. It would be a great benefit to the human race, it would be of vast benefit to all the nations of the world if, in some way or other, silver and gold might be put in such relation to each other that they would stand at par with each other at a given ratio. There is no doubt about that.

There will be no opposition among any portion of our people to the use of silver to the extent where it will not demonetize gold. Every one of those who are commonly classed by the popular feeling as goldites would be glad to see silver and gold placed upon a fixed parity, so that they could be maintained at par with each other among all the nations of the world, and be used everywhere as the standards of money. Those of us who believe that the gold standard should be maintained also believe that the silver standard should be maintained, but it can be maintained only when the market value of silver at a given ratio is equal to the market value of gold at the same ratio. That is our belief.

This proposition is, I think, a very taking one. If it is possible for the President of the United States to negotiate a treaty with Mexico, by which the United States might issue practically the silver coin now known as the Mexican dollar, and that coin can be used for a commercial dollar to be exported, not made a legal tender and not to be coined to an unlimited extent except for exportation, then I can see that it would give employment to probably a vast amount of silver.

No man can estimate the amount which might be used in such a country as China. China contains a population, it is said, of 400,000,000, and many of them are very intelligent people. They are shrewd, active people, who understand precisely the value of the dollar, and measure it to the last grain. If we can secure by a treaty stipulation an arrangement with Mexico, by which a dollar may be coined in our mints for exportation, then undoubtedly we should be able to give employment to a considerable amount of silver; we should relieve Mexico from the burden, and probably the expense, of coining that silver, and if we can send $100,000,000 or as much as can be produced in this country to China or the eastern countries, it will tend to advance the price of silver; and there is no one who does not desire to advance the price of silver nearer and nearer to the standard of gold. I shall, therefore, vote for the resolution.

I wish, however, to call the attention of my friend from Colorado to the fact that he has probably overlooked the ordinary language which is used in addressing resolutions to the President. There should be inserted in the resolution the words, "if not incompatible with the public interests." Those words should be inserted in the proper place in the resolution. I will ask the Secretary to read the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. WOLCOTT.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that if we were calling for information from the President of the United States, it would be perfectly proper and most courteous that we should say, "if, in his opinion, not incompatible with the public interests;" but we do a great many things here which, in the opinion of the President of the United States, are probably quite incompatible with the public interests. I suggest, therefore, that in a resolution directing something to be done, if it should not happen to meet with the view of the President and he did not want to do it, under the terms of the resolution he would not be required to do it. I am subject to correction if I am wrong.

Mr. SHERMAN. The President of the United States has the sole power to make treaties, but we may express our opinion of the expediency of his making a treaty of a particular kind. That would be right enough, and, therefore, we embody in such resolutions the ordinary terms. We merely ratify a treaty by a two-thirds vote, but the President makes the treaty. I am, however, rather indifferent about the form of the resolution, though I think the form I have suggested would be more courteous.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I certainly want to do whatever is proper in the matter.

Mr. McPHERSON. I understood the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] to say that he proposed to offer an amendment providing that the Mexican dollar should be coined for the purpose of export. Did I understand him correctly?

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not propose that. That would be left open to negotiation. As stated by the Senator from Colorado, these dollars are for export, and the treaty, as a matter of course, would be based upon that idea. It could not be otherwise.

Mr. McPHERSON. So also the trade dollars were intended for export, and the law providing for the coinage of the trade dollars expressly stated the purpose and use of those dollars to be for export to foreign countries. The Senator from Ohio knows full well what the result was in regard to the trade dollars. We were obliged to take them back and recoin them, under the idea and impression which obtained possession of the people, that the Government was in some way bound to redeem dollars which had been coined at its mints.

As I read the pending resolution it seems that it is for the purpose of increasing commerce. It says:

> That the President of the United States, with a view to encourage and extend our commercial relations with China and other Asiatic countries, be requested to enter into negotiations with the Republic of Mexico looking to the coinage by the United States, at its mints, of standard Mexican dollars.

Sir, to me it is a very humiliating admission to be found in an act of Congress that the Government of the United States, containing forty-four great States, its commerce greater by a hundredfold than that of the Republic of Mexico, having commercial relations with China, Japan, and with the islands of the sea, are not able to put into circulation trade dollars of 420 grains bearing the stamp or superscription of the United States. With all our commercial power and all our commerce with those nations we were not able to circulate trade dollars and keep them in circulation in those countries, but, at the expiration of a short time, found the coin returned to the United States and the Government felt obligated to redeem them, and did redeem them in standard silver dollars.

I do not understand, though perhaps the Senator from Colorado can instruct me, how it is possible by the coinage of Mexican dollars to increase our trade with China. If to-day a New York merchant buys a cargo of tea in China, he is obliged to pay for it by draft on England. The Chinese Government do not receive our silver coin. Why should they receive the coins of the Republic of Mexico? If a Chinese merchant owes a merchant in India a balance of trade, he is bound and obliged to pay the balance to the Indian merchant by a gold draft on London. So far even the silver countries themselves in making their exchanges of products refuse to settle their balances in other than gold.

Now, I can not conceive of any plan whereby an American merchant taking the Mexican dollars into China will be able to purchase goods in China to any better advantage than he would be with American dollars, to say nothing of the great humiliatoin which I think the American people must feel that we must add to our money, consisting to-day of eight different kinds of currency, gold and silver coins and their certificates, national-bank notes, Treasury notes, and United States notes, regardless of the fractional currency, another kind of currency having no legal status under the laws of the United States, which must of necessity return from China, and Japan, and India. If it is sent there for the purchase of Chinese goods it will inevitably return here for the purchase and payment of American goods. Therefore we are simply issuing another kind of currency not recognized by our laws, not a legal tender, which it is very probable the Government of the United States will in the immediate future be obliged by all honorable considerations to redeem.

I agree, so far as I can agree, with the wish of the honorable Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT], to increase so far as we can without harm and without injury to the financial condition of this country as it exists to-day the use of silver in our circulation, but it seems to me that the plan contemplated by the resolution will not make a demand or a market for very much silver, except we are willing to admit at the same time that it will return to the United States to plague us.

I have been so busy with other things that I have not been able even to read the resolution of the honorable Senator from Colorado until it was laid upon my desk this morning. I inquire of him if it would interfere with his purpose, plan, and wish if I should ask to have the resolution go over until to-morrow? I should like to present some observations on the subject.

Mr. STEWART. I should like to submit some observations before the resolution goes over.

Mr. McPHERSON. Very well; then I yield the floor to the Senator from Nevada. I am not prepared this morning to state the case as fully as I wish to state it.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] made an observation which may be misleading. He says the advocates of gold are also the friends of silver, and that all they desire is to maintain the parity. I wish to repeat what I have often said, that bimetallism is not the result of parity, but parity follows bimetallism. It followed it for thousands of years on the simplest principle in the world, that as long as you can get a given number of dollars or other units of money for a given quantity or weight of silver for another and different weight of gold, the amount of gold required and the amount of silver required to obtain that number of dollars are always of the same value and at a parity. Parity was maintained for thousands of years in that way, and whenever one of the metals became scarce, so that it was inconvenient to get it, they used the other, and the demand fell on the other until the parity was restored. It was automatic and worked for thousands of years.

Those who say they are in favor of parity and refuse the only legislation which can produce parity are either ignorant of what they say or they do not mean what they say. Everybody who has any sense at all knows if you cut off the market for silver it is just like anything else. It will fall. The market for silver at the mints was unlimited through all the ages until the fatal act of 1873, and while the market was unlimited it made no difference whether there was more silver produced or more gold; the parity regulated itself. From the discovery of America until 1803, von Humboldt tells us there were 44 ounces of silver produced for every ounce of gold, and it continued nearly the same up to 1850. There was a great preponderance of silver through all the ages; but from 1850 to 1860 there were not more than 4 or 5 ounces of silver produced to 1 of gold. The parity remained. If they could not get silver they used gold. As long as we had bimetallism we had parity. Nobody expects that we will have a parity while we have no bimetallism, which admits both metals to coinage. We do not coin silver. It is idle to talk about silver demonetized competing with gold monetized. We have made gold dear, and we have made labor and property cheap and produced stagnation because we have deprived the people of their money.

As to the pending resolution, I know no reason why it should not be adopted, except the fact that no opposition comes from the gold advocates. That makes it suspicious. But I am willing to act on my judgment. I fear, however, that Mexico will not consent, and it will amount to nothing. If they do consent and we coin some of these dollars and they are sent to China, they will augment the circulation of that kind of money in China, and it may possibly do some good. The mover of the resolution does not expect any great benefit from it. It has nothing at all to do with the silver question in this country.

But the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. McPHERSON] speaks of humiliating this country. Financially, it can be no more humiliated than to be at the beck and call of an English syndicate. We have reached the depth of humiliation when we have become a financial colony of Great Britain. That is degradation enough. He says further that he does not wish to disturb the present status. I think the majority of people in this country desire the present status of things disturbed. They desire a change for the better. We see discontent everywhere. We see a condition of things prevailing that has prevailed in every country before a great catastrophe happened—discontent; men tramping over the country starving for bread in this land of plenty. We may deride them, we may make fun of them, we may put them in our jails, but that experiment is not a new one. They were put in jails in Paris. The authorities put in jail as many as they could, until the prisons were full. The starving multitude moved on. Death marked their progress to Paris until they came in such numbers that they made resistance impossible. Force against universal insurrection has always failed. A Frenchman, whose name I do not remember, when this multitude was coming, exclaimed, "Force against universal insurrection is impossible." We may go on contracting the currency; we may go on depriving the people of money; we may go on reducing prices; we may go on inflicting calamities upon the country; but we already hear the murmurings coming up here.

When any one speaks of the present satisfactory condition of the country, I ask to whom is it satisfactory? It is only satisfactory to the owners of gold, and bonds resting upon undoubted security, and holders of office whose salaries have not been reduced. Those with fixed incomes may rejoice at cheap men and cheap labor and cheap property and stagnation, because they can realize what others have lost. This thing may go on; the gold party may be triumphant; they may be triumphant in the coming election. Some of the elections we have had indicate that it will be; but let me tell Senators right here and now that if the gold party are triumphant in the next election they will have to select a man for standard-bearer whom the gold party knows and the people do not know.

No man can go before the country in its suffering condition and ask for their votes in the next Presidential election on account of the repeal of the Sherman law and the adoption of the gold standard. If the gold party go forward they must put forth a man whom they know and can use. They dare not put forth a man who has fallen on his face before the money power. They dare not do it on either side; neither party will do it. The gold party may be successful by the destruction of the Democratic party or otherwise. By the destruction of the Democratic party the gold party may succeed. It may be that the chains of slavery can never be broken in this country. That is possible. But the people must be kept in ignorance. It must be done by subterfuge, and other issues than the real one must be kept before the country.

You must contend over the tariff question or something that does not affect the world generally. You must not let them know what is the matter. Then, by putting an equivocal candidate before the people who can make promises in public and break them when he gets into the White House, you may succeed with the gold party; and when you get into power you may have Federal election laws which will prevent the people from uprising. You may have those laws; you may bind the people hand and foot; you may create insurrection and the necessity for a stronger Government; you may change the form of government; but you can not do it if you will tell the people beforehand what you intend to do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the resolution. Does the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] wish to be further heard upon the subject?

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from New Jersey suggested that the resolution go over until to-morrow.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I understand the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] agrees that it shall go over.

Mr. SHERMAN. I offer the amendment which I suggested a few moments ago, so that it will read "the President of the United States, if not incompatible with the public interests," etc. I think those words ought to be inserted in the resolution as they are ordinarily in such resolutions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert after the words "United States," in the first line, the words:

If not incompatible with the public interests.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio desire to press his amendment now, or that it shall go over with the resolution?

Mr. SHERMAN. I think there will be no objection to the amendment.

Mr. GORMAN. There is no objection to it.

Mr. QUAY. I understood the Senator from Colorado to object to the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. He acquiesces in it.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I should like to offer an amendment to be considered when the resolution comes up. I do not ask a vote on it now. After the word "dollars," in line 6, I move to insert the words "for exportation."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not wish a vote upon the amendment now, but I will wait until the resolution comes up to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS. Has the resolution gone over?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not. The Senator from New Jersey asks that the resolution with the pending amendment and proposed amendment go over. Is there objection?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I have no objection to the resolution going over until to-morrow. I hope that then, if there are no further Senators to speak upon it, a vote may be had upon the resolution and the amendment. It is very possible that I shall be glad to accept the amendment to-morrow. I should like to look it over, however.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and it will be so ordered.

HOUR OF MEETING.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, believing as I do that there is no one question in which the 70,000,000 people whom we represent here are so deeply and directly interested as that of the early determination and final conclusion as to what the import duties of merchandise to this country are to be in the future, I am exceedingly anxious to reach some agreement by which we can devote much more time to its consideration day by day than we have done in the past. There is certainly no one question more important, and in my opinion no one question half as important, as that the business of the country shall know, and know at the earliest hour possible for us to inform them, what the rate of duties to be paid in the future are to be. In view of that fact I am tempted to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that we come to some agreement as to the hours that shall be devoted to the consideration of this question each day without interruption. Consulting my own wishes and opinion and that of a large number of Senators upon this side of the Chamber, I will ask unanimous consent that after to-day the Senate meet at 11 o'clock instead of 12.

Mr. QUAY. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. HARRIS. The objection comes very early. I have not finished, but it appears that I need not finish. However, I will proceed. The Senator might have withheld his objection until he heard the full statement.

Objection being made, I now ask the other side of the Chamber to tell me, and to tell this side, whether there is any agreement possible to devote more time, day by day, to the consideration of this great and vitally important question.

I submit my proposition in order that it may be considered, and am ready to hear counter propositions, if counter propositions are to be made. I apprehend there is no Senator on the other side or on this side who does not appreciate the importance of prompt action and the earliest decision that can be had, consistent with a full discussion and consideration of the question, being more important, as I think it is, than all other questions pending.

My proposition is, that we meet at 11 o'clock and devote one hour to the consideration of morning business, and that we take up the tariff bill promptly at 12 o'clock, and for the present week at least devote the whole time from 12 o'clock until 5 o'clock in the afternoon to general debate of the bill. Now, if such a suggestion is not agreeable to the other side of the Chamber, I shall be glad to hear any suggestions from that side of the Chamber as to what agreement would be acceptable to them.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I can state what agreement would be acceptable to me; and that is, that the further consideration of the tariff bill should be postponed until next December.

Mr. HARRIS. That I understand.

Mr. FRYE. Believing, as I do, that its enactment into law would do more harm to the industries and the people of this country than the war did, I shall, whenever I am present, object to any unanimous consent whatever touching the progress of the bill in the Senate.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, I do not assume to speak for this side of the Chamber, but in reply to the Senator from Tennessee I will state that I, for one, shall not voluntarily sit in the Senate Chamber upon days when ordinarily no session is held, nor during extraordinary hours, simply to expedite the passage of legislation which I believe will bring ruin to the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I see that no agreement is possible after the declarations of the Senators from Maine and Pennsylvania.

Mr. ALDRICH rose.

Mr. HARRIS. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, it does not seem to me that there is anything in the present situation of affairs in the Senate that should call for the adoption of unusual methods in the conduct of the public business. The Senators in opposition to the pending tariff bill appreciate as fully as the Senator from Tennessee can the importance of the discussion upon which we are about to enter. They are desirous, and only desirous, that the discussion shall proceed in an orderly manner, in a manner worthy of the traditions of the Senate and the importance of the subject. There have been no obstructive or dilatory or filibustering motions made upon this side of the Chamber, and there will be none unless we are forced by attempts to adopt some unusual methods in the conduct of the business of the Senate.

We have had two speeches upon this question during the week which has passed, and we are now entering upon a third speech. There are some considerations pertinent to this question which make it impossible for the Senators in opposition to the bill to discuss it intelligently at the present time. There has been no explanation from any one familiar with the measure as to its effects or results so far as revenue is concerned, or so far as the details of the bill are concerned. We, upon this side of the Chamber, know nothing as to what form the bill is finally to take. Within the past two or three days something like thirty or forty amendments have been suggested by the majority members of the Finance Committee. We know from common rumor and from statements of interested parties that changes in rates and in the phraseology of the bill are now being made from day to day for the purpose, apparently, of rewarding the friends of the measure or gaining the votes necessary to pass it, or for punishing those who are presumptious enough to oppose its provisions.

I think the gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber, the friends of the measure, are bound at the outset of the discussion to tell us what in their opinion will be its effect upon the revenues, to explain its extraordinary provisions, applicable to every paragraph and to every section of the bill. They are bound to tell us or give us some sort of an idea as to the exact and definite provisions of the bill in the form in which they shall ask the Senate to pass it. Until that is done there can be no intelligent answer from this side of the Chamber and no intelligent criticism about a bill whose provisions we do not as yet know.

So it seems to me it comes with ill grace from the Senator from Tennessee or any other Senator to say at this stage of the discussion that we should adopt any unusual hours or any unusual methods. We on this side of the Chamber (and I think that is true of the opponents of the bill, whether upon one side of the Chamber or the other) intend to treat this matter in a spirit which is worthy of this great question, affecting as it does vitally the interests of every man, woman, and child in the United States.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, it is the fact——

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, I rise to a question of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Hampshire will state his question of order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I call for the regular order.

Mr. HARRIS. It is because of the fact that it is a question of vital interest to every man and woman in the United States that I have urged that we shall determine the question at the earliest possible moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair directs the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the fact that there is no motion pending. It is simply a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. HARRIS. I have asked for unanimous consent, which met with objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know whether the Senator from Tennessee is in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The discussion is proceeding by unanimous consent, as the Chair understands.

Mr. CHANDLER. I leave it to the Senator from Tennessee himself whether he is in order. We always submit to his decisions on questions of order. If he says he is in order I shall not object to his going on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee has the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from New Hampshire was very patient while the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] was discussing the merits of this question, as to which I have not said a word. But I am going to make a motion to which the Senator from New Hampshire can raise no question of order. Of course he will oppose it. I move that on and after to-morrow, until otherwise ordered, the Senate meet at 11 o'clock a. m.

I wish to say that I have no desire to enter upon the discussion of the merits or demerits of the tariff bill at this time. I was only urging the point that it is vitally important to the business of the country to know at the earliest moment that we can inform them what the policy in respect to taxation is to be in the future. No Senator on the other side of the Chamber or on this side can for one moment doubt the absolute importance of letting the country know so soon as we can. I do not desire to subject any Senator on the other side or on this to the slightest inconvenience. I desire to accommodate the convenience of Senators just as far as is consistent with the great importance of an early disposition of the question pending before the Senate.

To accomplish this result I am ready to subject myself to the inconvenience of coming here at earlier hours and sitting here to later hours.

I, of course, do not know whether the bill will pass or not. That is a question to be determined in the future, and the sooner it is determined the better it will be for the business of the country and the whole people of the country. That is my point, and the only point that I propose to make at this time. Whatever its fate is to be let us reach it at the earliest hour that we can.

Mr. LODGE. I desire to inquire of the Chair whether under the rule the motion does not go over under one objection?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It does.

Mr. LODGE. Then I make the objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion will go over, under the rule.

Mr. HARRIS. That is proper.

ISSUE OF BONDS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a previous day, submitted by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PEFFER].

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. PEFFER March 28, 1894, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be, and it is hereby, instructed to prepare and report as soon as practicable a bill to repeal all laws authorizing or permitting the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds or other interest-bearing obligations of the Government, and to prohibit any and all such issues in the future without express authority by act of Congress first had and obtained.

Mr. PEFFER. Inasmuch as I expect to yield the floor to the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] at 2 o'clock for the discussion of the tariff bill, I shall occupy the remainder of the time until 2 o'clock with the discussion of the pending resolution.

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator from Kansas does not expect to conclude his remarks this morning?

Mr. PEFFER. If I am not interrupted, I shall probably conclude before 2 o'clock. This matter has been passed over so long that I object to its being passed over any longer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. PEFFER. No, sir; not for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas will proceed.

Mr. PEFFER. Mr. President, thirty-two members of this body will complete their present terms of service within one year from the 4th day of last month, and their successors will be chosen by Legislatures to be elected in the mean time.

It is reasonable that these Senators should desire to be returned, and that renders it proper that the voters of the States they represent should have some fresh and official testimony tending to show the attitude of the candidates toward the Government's bond-issuing policy, for that is going to be a leading issue in the election campaigns of this year. This resolution affords Senators a good opportunity to testify in their own behalf touching that important matter.

The Secretary of the Treasury has once, and as a great many people believe, and as I believe, without authority of law, issued a block of $50,000,000 in 5 per cent ten-year bonds when there was plenty of money in the Treasury to meet every lawful and legitimate demand against the Government. That, to my mind, is evidence conclusive that, unless Congress interferes to prevent it, that officer will again resort to the same method of pledging the public credit whenever in his opinion it ought to be done.

It is not at all difficult to foresee that, in pursuing the policy which the Government has adopted, the condition of our finances will soon move the Secretary to sell another large amount of bonds.

The President, in his message vetoing the seigniorage bill, foreshadowed the situation which is soon to appear unless wise counsels prevail in the deliberations of this body. The President suggests his willingness to approve any measure providing for silver coinage if the bill also provides that the silver coin may be permitted to lie idle in the Treasury and bonds be sold for gold to defray the public expenses. The President uses these words:

This leads me to earnestly present the desirability of granting to the Secretary of the Treasury a better power than now exists to issue bonds to protect our gold reserve when for any reason it should be necessary. Our currency is in such a confused condition and our financial affairs are apt to assume at any time so critical a position that it seems to me such a course is dictated by ordinary prudence.

The President understands the situation perfectly, and it is unfortunate that he does not acquaint the country with the fact that the Government finances are at the mercy of bankers and speculators. This great, humiliating fact the President leaves the people to learn as best they may, while he proceeds to pledge their credit though they have provided an abundance of money to meet all demands and have just offered to furnish $55,000,000 more.

That the President does not speak as plainly in his public utterances as he is reported to have spoken privately in relation to this matter, and that he is not as prompt to act in the public interest as the situation seems to require, is particularly hurtful.

The President is reported to have said, in an interview with a Southern Congressman recently, that the banks have the Government within their control. I do not quote the exact words, but they are substantially the words reported, that the banks could drain the Treasury in twenty-four hours. I have said the same thing in this Chamber and was laughed at, my language being taken as the wild vagaries of a Populist. Now, the President of the United States, speaking from the most exalted position among men, tells the people the same thing; and I do not believe that there is one well-informed man in every thousand in the country who does not believe that the President speaks truly. I have repeatedly charged upon this floor and elsewhere that the Government of the United States is in partnership with Wall street.

I do not know but that I shall have to revise my estimate and say that the Government of the United States is absolutely at the mercy of Wall street. And now we are informed that a bill has been introduced into the House of Representatives providing for the issuance of bonds and the coinage of some silver dollars. Heretofore it was to coin silver and to issue bonds. Now the object is to issue bonds and coin silver, and not only permit but require that the silver coin shall lie idle and unused in the Treasury, and that the public business shall be transacted on gold borrowed from the banks of New York City.

The trend is toward a bond policy, and it is only because, to use the language imputed to the President, "the banks have got the country by the leg. They can drain the Treasury in forty-eight hours."

If Congress will perform its duty the hold of the banks will soon be loosened. If Congress is derelict, the people will take the matter in hand and the day of a just retribution will have come.

It is an astounding declaration, sir, to come from the President of the United States that the Government is at the mercy of bankers; it is more astounding that, knowing our condition, the President suggests nothing by way of relief. It is amazing beyond measure that the Senate, knowing the terrible facts as well as the President does, is not moved promptly to defensive action.

Let us pass this resolution and require the Finance Committee to bring in a bill to stop this dangerous proceeding.

But there is another matter, Mr. President. We are now discussing a revenue bill. It involves great and permanent interests. It is important that the people know what is to be the permanent financial policy of the Government so that we may conform our tariff legislation to it. If we are to go permanently on a gold basis and to become subservient to gold speculators, then it is a question whether we should not repeal all our tariff laws, abolish all our custom-houses, and open our harbors freely to the trade of the world.

I am frank to say for myself, Mr. President, and the people whom I have the honor to represent here that if it is to be the policy of the Government of the United States that we shall pay all of our debts in gold, whether we have the gold or not, that we are to measure all of our money of seven or eight different kinds by a gold standard, that we are no longer to use silver as money, I am then not only ready, but anxious to go at once to the other experiment. If we are to compete with the gold money and the gold labor of Europe, let us have trade free. If the farmers of Kansas are compelled to sell their surplus grain, cattle, and wool in a market where the prices are dictated by gold, then let us have the benefit of the other side of the proposition; let us have gold prices for clothing, and gold prices for all the supplies of the farmer and the farmer's family.

But, Mr. President, if we are to have the old policy continued, the policy that has descended to us from our fathers, with the difference between the gold and silver and what the people need to be made up by Government paper, then we can continue our protective policy. Then we can continue to pay good wages to labor. Then we can continue to so regulate our commercial legislation as that our people and our interests shall bear share and share alike.

Hence I submit that as another view of this case. It is important from every point of view that we understand what is going to be the permanent policy of the Government. If, whenever a little flurry arises in Wall street, we are to issue bonds and pledge the credit of the people, have a little discussion of a few days and the passing backward and forward of a few dollars in gold, a few dollars in paper, and then continue the old revolution over again, it is time the country should know it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the resolution be read.

The Secretary again read the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. That is a positive direction to the committee to report a particular kind of bill.

Mr. PEFFER. That is just what was intended, Mr. President.

Mr. HARRIS. That is what I understand. I want the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. STEWART. Upon that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PEFFER. And I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAREY (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY], who is not in the Chamber, and for the present I withhold my vote.

Mr. GIBSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE], and withhold my vote.

Mr. MCLAURIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON]. If he were present I should vote "yea."

Mr. WILSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON]. I do not see him in the Chamber, and therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FAULKNER (after having voted in the affirmative). I voted inadvertently, believing the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] to be present. I was paired with him while he was absent last week, and I suppose he regards the pair as continuing to-day. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. GRAY. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], but being informed that he would vote "yea" on this question, I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. BRICE. I had a general pair with the junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT]. My place having been taken by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER], I vote "yea."

Mr. BERRY. I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. GALLINGER. A few days ago, when the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN] left the city, he requested me to announce that he is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. I neglected to state the pair on two or three votes that occurred in the Senate, and I desire to make the announcement now.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], but I think under the circumstances I shall be justified in voting on this question, and I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—37.

Aldrich,	Davis,	Jones, Ark.	Sherman,
Bate,	Dolph,	Lindsay,	Squire,

So the resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance.

THE REVENUE BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 4864.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

Mr. PEFFER. I have been requested to yield the floor to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], with which request I have great pleasure in complying.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from New York yield to me one second?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. I simply desire to say that the debate has thus far proceeded by unanimous consent without reading the bill that is now submitted to the Committee of the Whole. I shall, upon the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from New York, ask for the reading of the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not consent to the statement of the law as laid down by the Senator from Tennessee, but I do not care to discuss that point now.

Mr. HARRIS. The RECORD will show the accuracy of my statement, that the debate has gone on thus far by unanimous consent; and after the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from New York I shall object to further debate until the bill has been read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York will proceed.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, the political revolution which commenced in 1890 and culminated in 1892 was an emphatic expression of the popular will in behalf of certain governmental policies. Measures, and not men, were largely the issues involved in that movement. Rightly interpreted, it indicated the public sentiment in opposition to intrenchment upon the reserved rights of the States through odious Federal election laws, some proposed and others then existing; it voiced the general demand for a discontinuance of the unwise and indefensible financial system of silver-bullion purchases by the Government, instead of the coinage contemplated by the Constitution, a system equally a hindrance to the return to bimetallism as well as a menace to a sound and stable currency; it manifested the desire for a better administration of public affairs, greater economy in governmental expenditures, and the exaction of higher official standards in the execution of public trusts; it demanded a more safe, dignified, and consistent foreign policy; and it condemned that abuse or perversion of the taxing power of the Government which is known as the policy of protection "for protection's sake alone," and declared in favor of a tariff for revenue.

Invested with the responsibility of government, the prompt enforcement of these policies devolved upon the party in power. The wisdom of its action in discharging the duties thus assigned it by the suffrages of the people, may at least be partially conceded, even by its opponents.

OUR FOREIGN POLICY.

It is not denied that some mistakes have occurred. Our foreign policy, especially that relating to Hawaii, it must be admitted, has not met the expectations of the people. A sense of humiliation prevailed when the project for the restoration of a deposed monarchy was unfolded by the Administration, and gratification ensued when its abandonment or failure was reluctantly announced, influenced largely by an aroused public sentiment.

That unfortunate contemplated policy was a blunder, and a blunder is sometimes worse than a crime. It was, however, the natural consequence which might well have been anticipated from that other mistake in placing the Department of State in charge of a Republican statesman, distinguished and estimable though he may be, whose public services have always been identified in opposition to the Democratic party, who was without sympathy for its traditions and purposes, and whose political convictions upon the disputed public questions of the day, if changed at all, are carefully concealed.

It is to be regretted that the President should not have been able to find in his own party some safe and honored statesman in whom he and his party could have placed confidence, one of Democratic instincts and training, whose management of foreign affairs would have reflected credit upon the country, and would have avoided the promulgation of that un-American policy—a departure from Democratic precedents—which was sought to be forced upon an unwilling people. In this view of the situation our opponents must accept some share of the responsibility for the blunders committed in our foreign affairs.

GOOD GOVERNMENT.

In other respects the present administration of our Government affords scant grounds for ust criticism.

The various Departments under Democratic control are rigidly enforcing economy and the pledges to the people are being reasonably fulfilled. In the main we are enjoying an era of good government.

REPEAL OF FEDERAL ELECTION LAW.

That last relic of post bellum legislation known as the Federal election law has been repealed by the present Congress, thus promptly carrying out one of the important promises of the Chicago platform. The power to control all their elections without Federal interference or dictation, which the States always enjoyed from the foundation of the Government down to 1871, has been restored to them. It is a triumph for the just doctrine of State rights, under constitutional limitations; it is a tribute to the unselfishness and patriotism of the Democratic party, which, discarding the patronage incident to the enforcement of this law, and insured to it by at least three more years control of the Federal administration, unhesitatingly asserts its devotion to a principle, and thereby relieves the people at once from further unnecessary annoyances, useless offices, and prodigal expenditures.

REPEAL OF THE SHERMAN LAW.

The repeal of the Sherman silver bullion purchase law within the first eight months after its advent to power marked the fulfillment of another pledge by the Democratic party. It evidenced our sincerity as well as prudence. It met the just demands of public sentiment. While there were honest and respectful differences of opinion among many good Democrats here and elsewhere as to what other or further legislation ought to take the place of the repealed law, or to precede, accompany, or follow such repeal, there were never any substantial differences as to the inadequate, illogical, and indefensible character of the Sherman law itself and the desirability of the redemption of the party pledge for its abolition.

That result has been accomplished. Whether that high degree of prosperity has ensued from such action which some of our officials anticipated and others predicted is another and a different question, not now necessary to be considered. It is sufficient that we have speedily removed the objectionable legislation which our opponents had fastened upon the country.

REVENUE REFORM.

The duty which now especially confronts us is the revision of the sum and methods of Federal taxation, consequent upon a transfer of the political control of the Federal Government from the custody where it had been lodged for thirty-two years.

That revision should be approached with circumspection, and with a realizing sense of the changed condition of the country since 1887 and 1890.

An extreme reduction of tariff duties at a time when the Treasury was swollen with a surplus of a hundred million dollars, when the country was reasonably prosperous, when all our industries were in motion, and all our workingmen were employed, assumes a different aspect and presents a different question when proposed now with a large and growing Treasury deficit, instead of a surplus, staring us in the face, with our industries paralyzed, our manufactories closed, our workingmen idle, and following upon the heels of one of the most disastrous financial panics in our history.

What was safe and prudent and wise then it would be criminal folly to attempt now.

THE RECENT MONETARY PANIC.

A month prior to his inauguration the President was forewarned of the approaching monetary panic. He convened Congress six months later, when the panic was subsiding which should have been averted.

It is feared that this Congress does not keenly appreciate the awful devastation which the financial cyclone of last summer has inflicted upon the business interests of our country. It has made havoc of our prosperity, private and public. It has slaughtered private incomes. It has paralyzed private industries. It has forced bankruptcies without precedent in number and sum. It has diminished all domestic and interstate trade, until a fifth of our railroad mileage is in the hands of receivers, and all our banks are gorged with money unemployed. It has struck down by hundreds the captains of our industry who have been wont to organize profitable enterprises, borrow capital, and lead the great army of labor.

The past savings of our skilled workmen are drawn down. They think themselves lucky to get half-time employment in these dark days; and less skilled laborers by the hundred thousand are suffering hunger, willing but unable to earn their daily bread. It is heartbreaking as a pestilence.

NO TIME FOR PARTISANSHIP.

This is no time for partisan reproaches, however just. This is no time for Democrats to say to Republicans, "Your bad laws did it." This is no time for Republicans to say to Democrats, "Your remedies would increase trouble." It is a time to fling partisanship to the winds if that will speed the deliverance of our fellow-countrymen and revive our prostrate business interests.

This Senate is nearly equally politically divided, and it is apparent that if prompt remedial legislation is expected, then radicalism in any direction must be discarded. The critical situation demands wise and conservative action speedily secured. The extreme features of the McKinley bill must be eradicated in obedience to the people's mandate, but patriotism alike demands that extremes in the opposite direction must also be avoided.

On the 4th of March, 1893, the President became vested with exclusive power to convene Congress earlier than the law day, for the purpose reaffirmed in his election. He decided to prolong the operation of the McKinley tariff for at least another year. The delay thus imposed upon the people's reforming zeal it is vain to regret. In the mean time the monetary panic unfortunately precipitated upon us has not only made havoc of our private industries, but has dried up the public revenues.

THE TREASURY DEFICIT.

The size of the Treasury deficit at the close of the current fiscal year has twice been estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury.

On the 19th of December he took its measure. On the 15th of January he took its measure, the measure of the same deficit, to accrue on the 30th of June, 1894.

These two measures of the same thing, taken twenty-seven days apart, are not perfectly identical. In his annual report the Secretary of the Treasury informed Congress of a deficit for the current fiscal year of $28,000,000.

A short month later, in his letter to the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, the same Secretary of the Treasury finds the same deficit to be $78,000,000.

It may be unjust to the Secretary of the Treasury, as well as absurd in itself, to assume that suggestions in his annual report made when he thought the deficit of the current fiscal year to be $28,000,000 stand good after his discovery a month later that the size of the deficit is $78,000,000.

The same observation would apply to the President's message last December 4, dealing as he said with "existing conditions," which in fact have ceased to exist, and prefiguring a bill "on the lines herein suggested" (to wit, in his message), warranted by him "to produce sufficient revenue to meet the needs of the Government," when those needs were underestimated $50,000,000. Yet the Wilson bill, framed originally upon the theory suggested by these high officials in their annual communications to Congress, underwent no material change during its progress through the House, notwithstanding the altered situation. The theory survived its conditions.

In the face of the prostration of private industries, and in the presence of such a paralysis of all general business as the Treasury deficit attests and prolongs, this bill as framed by its authors and as passed by the House sought to double the deficit by discarding customs revenue and to fill the void with an income tax.

THE PROTEST OF NEW YORK.

Against such a scheme—unnecessary, ill-timed, and mischievous—suddenly sprung upon the country in the hour of its distress, un-Democratic in its nature and socialistic in its tendencies—I enter the protest of the people of the State of New York. They utterly dissent from any proposal to get revenue for the General Government by taxing incomes. Their dissent is practically unanimous and altogether implacable.

Neither am I satisfied that the people of the country agree with the President in desiring the undebated change, sudden reversal, and complete transformation in the character of our Federal taxation, from indirect to direct, involved in the proposed plan to establish a sort of taxation not now championed by either of the parties who would have to administer it; by all parties for three-fourths of a century justly believed to be inhibited; then after trial in the war stress, denounced by one party and discarded by the other party; and found odious throughout the Northern States without distinction of party.

NOT RECOMMENDED BY THE PRESIDENT.

The recommendation in the President's annual message is cited in justification of the proposed tax. It is as follows:

> A measure has been prepared by the appropriate Congressional committee embodying tariff reform on the lines herein suggested which will be promptly submitted for legislative action. * * * The committee after full consideration * * * have wisely embraced in their plan a few additional internal-revenue taxes, including a small tax upon incomes derived from certain corporate investments. * * * In my great desire for the success of this measure I can not restrain the suggestion, etc.

It will strike the thoughtful observer familiar with the history of the Government as a strange and unusual procedure that the President of the United States should seriously inform Congress of what one of its own committees has been doing in the preparation of a bill. It might be safely assumed that Congress already had such information unless the bill had been prepared in the executive department and had been submitted to the committee concurrently with the transmission of the message to Congress. In these latter days the distinctions between the functions and prerogatives of the executive department on the one hand and the legislative department on the other do not seem to be always observed. The truth is that the first information which Congress had of the alleged details of the proposed bill was in the message itself.

But the strangest part of this unprecedented proceeding was that in fact at the very date of the message, to wit, December 4, 1893, neither the full Committee of Ways and Means nor the Democratic members thereof had agreed upon any income tax or upon other internal taxation. The President's information was therefore inaccurate as well as premature. This awkward situation was not improved by the President's expression of his "desire for the success of this measure," being a measure not yet perfected, a bill in an inchoate state.

But aside from any question of impropriety involved in the recommendation of a particular measure or of an incomplete measure, instead of a general recommendation of tariff reform, leaving details to the discretion of Congress, and while conceding that the President in the first suggestion of a limited income tax injected the poison which has now spread until it has developed into a general income tax, nevertheless the latter scheme can not find any real justification in the President's message.

He does not recommend a general income tax upon all the income of individuals, but only a tax upon such limited income as may be "derived from certain corporate investments."

NEITHER BY SECRETARY CARLISLE.

Secretary Carlisle in his annual report is equally guarded and insists upon the same limitation. His report assumed that there was no possibility of the adoption of a general income tax such as formerly existed, and while apparently conceding the odious and inquisitorial character of such tax and its liability to evasion, he defends a limited tax upon incomes derived from corporate investments, upon the plausible ground that—

> The assessments or returns need not be based upon information extorted by the law from the persons charged with their payment, but upon the public records and the regular and authentic accounts of the corporations and companies in which the investments have been made; and they have the additional merit of being imposed entirely upon that part of the citizen's income which is not earned by his labor or skill, but which in the cases of legacies and successions, is acquired by mere operation of law, or by gratuitious bequests, and in the case of incomes from investments in corporations and joint stock companies, by the simple earning capacity of his capital as such, without personal effort on his part.

Yet disregarding or exceeding the recommendations of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury this bill proposes to tax all the income of an individual, whether "earned by his labor or skill," or otherwise, and to obtain the necessary information not from an inspection of public records, but from an investigation of all his private books and papers.

A Federal income tax, whether limited as suggested by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury or general, as provided in this bill, is equally objectionable.

THE "FRANCHISE" ARGUMENT.

The argument that a Federal tax upon incomes derived from corporate investments may with propriety be imposed, because corporations are invested by law with valuable franchises not enjoyed by the individual citizen, would have more weight if such franchises were usually granted by Federal instead of State authority. The reverse is just the fact, however, and while State authorities might with much reason upon such ground tax the franchises as well as the earnings and dividends of such corporations for the support of their State governments, the Federal Government has no particular standing or equities for such purpose. It is immaterial to the General Government whether it is an individual or a corporation that is in receipt of income, as the right or propriety of taxing such income is no greater in one case than in the other, except in the rare instances where the corporation may have received its charter through national favor. This bill taxes both individual and corporate incomes alike.

In New York and in several other States a "franchise" tax is imposed upon the earnings of certain corporations, and an income tax, such as is proposed in this measure, would duplicate the taxation already imposed and compel the States to abandon their State taxation. This is a most important and serious objection to this feature of the bill.

In New York alone there was last year received from State taxation on the capital and earnings of corporations the sum of $1,006,047.45, excluding, of course, the taxation of their real estate and personal property, and any local taxation. In the same State there was also received last year the sum of $3,071,687.09 from the State inheritance and gift tax. These taxes from which the State derives these enormous sums could not well be maintained or collected without the most extreme hardship in the event of the enactment of this bill, which taxes the same sources 2 per cent.

It follows that the State taxes would necessarily have to be abandoned, and the amounts heretofore received would have to be collected from real estate or in other ways. New York's interest in opposition to this feature of the proposed bill can thus be appreciated.

THE INJUSTICE NOT MITIGATED.

Neither is the injustice of the proposed corporate tax mitigated by the fact that it is against corporations rather than against individuals, because, although in form imposed upon the corporations, the amount thereof is deducted from the dividends paid to the individual stockholders, and it is virtually a tax upon individuals, for all practical purposes.

The individual stockholders are not necessarily the rich, but they usually include all classes, and frequently among them are found widows, orphans, trustees, and executors, and persons of ordinary means who have invested their all in these corporate securities, relying upon their dividends for their support.

If the suggestion for the taxation of incomes "derived from corporate investments" was largely based for its acceptability to the people upon the well understood popular prejudice against corporations, the proposition has a very weak moral support, because after all it is the individual stockholders whose dividends would be diminished, and who would be seriously injured by the proposed tax.

A Federal tax upon the earnings or dividends of corporations is no more defensible than such tax upon the earnings of individuals.

THE TAX TOO LARGE.

This bill neither follows the recommendations of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury as to the kind of income tax desired nor as to the amount or rate of the tax itself.

The President preferring not to be specific, but cautious, recommended simply "a small tax upon incomes." The Secretary suggested a tax of 1 per cent. The bill repudiates both suggestions and adopts a tax of 2 per cent on all incomes over $4,000, no matter how large the excess may be.

AN INDEFENSIBLE EXEMPTION.

This exemption of so much as $4,000 necessarily leads to considerable criticism. If an income tax is justifiable at all, it is difficult upon theory to defend any exemptions, at least of any material amount. Exemptions are merely a matter of governmental charity or favor, and not a matter of strict right; and being in derogation of a general principle, they should not be unreasonably enlarged. If incomes are properly taxable, then all incomes should be taxed, of whatever amount, taxed proportionally, without favoritism to any individual or class. The man of moderate means should pay as well as the man of wealth, both according to what income they actually receive, no more and no less, and no matter what the amount may be, great or small. This must be the correct theory of an income tax, if any it has.

Such a tax being largely of foreign origin and having been imported into this country and injected into this bill, it might be expected that the exemptions would follow foreign precedents. Prussia only tolerates an exemption of $225. In Germany the exemption varies from $70 to $600. In Denmark it is $215, and in Austria, $113, and in England $750. Yet here the proposed exemption is to be the liberal sum of $4,000, a figure for which there is no precedent anywhere in the world. So large an exemption necessarily creates a numerous class receiving a respectable income, twice as much as is ordinarily necessary to furnish a fair living, who pay no tax whatever. This necessarily creates a privileged or exempted class on the one hand as against a taxpaying class on the other.

When real estate is taxed all that the individual owns is taxed without the exemption of any part. So with personal property aside from a few unimportant exceptions. So with the earnings of corporations—all are taxed, or none at all. The same principle applies to the oleomargarine and the State-bank tax—there are no exemptions tolerated. But in the strenuous effort to popularize this war tax in time of peace every just principle of taxation is either violated or unreasonably extended.

DAVID A. WELLS'S VIEWS.

The Hon. David A. Wells, of Connecticut, contributes an able and interesting article in the Forum of last month in opposition to an income tax. His attitude upon this question may create a suspicion of his loyalty to the cause of tariff reform in the minds of a select coterie of overzealous professional reformers with which the country is afflicted, but not in the minds of the American people. Mr. Wells was a sincere and radical friend of revenue reform many long years before any politician or official selfishly sought to monopolize it as his own particular hobby, and his sentiments will carry much weight with thinking men. Upon the precise point which I am discussing, he writes as follows:

> The authors of the proposed income tax now before Congress especially proclaim that the chief object sought by them in this measure is to transfer the burdens of the State from the shoulders of the poor to those of the rich. It is, therefore, interesting to note where they propose to draw the line in respect to charity and as to the amount of property the possession or enjoyment of which, in their opinion, constitutes riches.
> If we assume 5 per cent as about the present annual average profit on money, land, or other property in the United States over and above all charges and taxes, then an exemption of $4,000, in an assessment under an income tax, would represent an accumulation, or business, or profession, of the value of $80,000. If we take the rate at which the United States can borrow money, namely, 3 per cent, then an exemption of $4,000 would represent an accumulation of a citizen invested in United States securities of $133,333. And according to any fair interpretation of the action of the committee reporting a $4,000 exemption, a citizen who is worth less than $80,000 of ordinary property yielding income, or $133,000 of property invested in United States bonds, is a legitimate object of national charity; the above sums representing the dividing line in the United States between those who are entitled to be regarded as poor and those who are entitled to be considered rich. Such an assumption finds no precedent in fiscal history. Such an exemption is unwarranted favoritism to nine-tenths of the well-to-do people of the United States, who are abundantly able to pay any just proportion of the taxes which the Government finds it necessary to impose for its support.
> No man is a freeman whose industry and capital are subject to exaction and from which his immediate competitors are entirely exempt. Equality of taxation of all persons and property brought into open competition under like circumstances is necessary to produce equality of condition for all, in all production, and in all the enjoyments of life, liberty, and property. And government, whatever name it may assume, is a despotism, and commits acts of flagrant spoliation, if it grants exemption or exacts a greater or less rate of tax from one man than from another man, on account of the one owning or having in his possession more or less of the same class of property which is subject to the tax.
> If it were proposed to levy a tax of 2 per cent on annual incomes below $4,000 in amount and exempt all incomes above this sum, the unequal and discriminating character of the exemption would be at once apparent; and yet an income tax exempting all incomes below $4,000 is equally unjust and discriminating. In either case the exemption can not be founded or defended on any sound principles of free constitutional government, and is simply a manifestation of tyrannical power under whatever form of government it may be enforced. The great republican principle of equality before the law and constitutional law itself alike preclude any exemption of income derived from like property.

I can add nothing to the force of these observations.

IT IS INQUISITORIAL.

An income tax is objectionable because from its very nature it must be inquisitorial in its imposition and collection. The senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] calls this allegation a "noisy and resounding charge." Let me tell him that it is not half so noisy as the constant vituperations which we hear on every hand from blatant demagogues who are abroad in the land loudly inveighing against the wealth of the country and impudently demanding its confiscation through every means which their devilish ingenuity can invent.

The charge is indeed a "resounding" one! It was heard years ago in France against unjust and arbitrary taxes when Talleyrand and others declared that "every system of taxation which necessitates personal and arbitrary inquisitions for its execution is inconsistent with the maintenance of a free people." The charge has "resounded" all over the world whenever despotisms have attempted to enforce similar taxes to the annoyance and detriment of the people. The charge that this tax is inquisitorial is scarcely denied even by the distinguished Senator from Indiana, and is only attempted to be palliated by the pretense that other taxes are equally so; but there is no foundation even for this pretense.

Real estate is open and aboveboard; its value is easily ascertainable, and its taxation presents no offensive features. Under ordinary laws the assessors have no right to enter and ransack your premises. Your home is your castle and it is sacred from intrusion. The taxation of personal property presents difficulties, of course, but visible personalty may be readily reached without annoyance to the owner. The taxation of corporate property is easily effected by general inquiry and an inspection of public or other records usually accessible.

The fact that in a few States of the Union tax laws have been adopted which unnecessarily pry into the taxpayers' private affairs and are unusually harsh and offensive furnishes no argument why they should be selected as models for the whole United States. They are exceptional in their character and should not be followed.

If they are cited to show their acceptability to the people, I might, on the other hand, point to the fact that income taxes are so distasteful that they have been tolerated in only a very limited number of States.

Neither does the circumstance that the Government in the collection of our customs duties insists upon the inspection of the baggage of passengers entering the country, in order to prevent frauds upon the revenue—and sometimes searches their persons—afford any justification for the enactment of an income tax, the collection of which must largely depend upon inquisitorial proceedings. One procedure is necessary and unavoidable, the other is not. One law is framed principally to reach foreigners and strangers entering the country, while the other applies almost entirely to our own citizens. One has the safe precedents of centuries to support it, the other is the modern or at least the bad invention of monarchical governments.

A municipality has the right to compel individual vaccination in the interest of the public health, but this reasonable and indispensable exercise of authority would afford no excuse for the establishment of an elaborate system for the enforced general attendance of public physicians upon individual citizens and their families. There is reason in all things, and one necessary and proper encroachment upon the absolute personal freedom of the citizen should not be made the pretext for other and more extensive ones, which are obnoxious to a free people and consistent only with despotism.

ITS BAD FEATURES.

This bill compels the taxpayer, under severe pains and penalties, to make a return under oath of his income, whereby he discloses all his private affairs and business to the agents of the Government; and if in the opinion—the mere belief—of such agents the return is false, fraudulent, or contains any misstatement, they may arbitrarily summon the citizen before them with all his books and papers, and compel him to submit to examination under oath. They may question, cross-examine, and annoy him to their heart's content. There is no limit fixed anywhere.

The hearing is conducted in secret; there is no tribunal or judge to regulate or check them; no one to prevent improper, impertinent, or insulting questions; no one to protect the witness in his rights—he refuses to answer at his peril. Neither is that all; they may "enter into and upon his premises," and presumably into the very sanctity of his home to obtain "from their own view," as the statute says, any additional information they may desire.

All this is to be tolerated and sanctioned by a free people to enable the Government in time of peace to extort from a limited class engaged in laudable occupations, who, by reason of their good fortune, their brains, their enterprise, or their pluck, have accumulated a little more of this world's goods than their fellows, when other and ample and better sources of revenue are always accessible. The provisions of this bill are dangerous in the extreme. What temptations they offer; of what abuses they are capable; what vast powers they confer!

These officials of the Government, intrusted with these enormous powers, would not hold their positions for life or during good behavior as in European countries where income taxes are fostered, but they would be partisans, subservient and anxious to please—removable at pleasure.

What opportunities such laws and such officials would afford to an unscrupulous administration desiring to assail and injure its political adversaries or to build up a personal faction of its own!

This bill also provides for the official supervision of the business of corporations by requiring all their transactions to be spread upon their books and to be open to the inspection at all reasonable times of "any internal-revenue officer or agent." The House bill sought to restrict such inspection so that it should only be had whenever necessary for the purpose of verifying the returns made by such corporations, and at no other time, but the Finance Committee, presumably under the lead of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], whose zeal in behalf of this tax seems to have outrun his discretion, have amended the House bill so as to remove all such restrictions and to place the books of such corporations absolutely at the disposal of the officials at all times.

ITS POWERS WILL BE ABUSED.

But it is said that these extraordinary powers and privileges may not be abused, and it is also urged that the provisions punishing by a fine not exceeding $1,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding a year, or both, at the discretion of the court, any official who makes public any information obtained by him in the discharge of his duties, are sufficient to prevent disclosures of the citizen's business and private affairs.

Experience has demonstrated that such penal provisions afford little protection to the people. There are statutes which forbid the disclosure of the contents of telegrams, but leaks are constantly discovered. Grand juries are sworn to secrecy, but their proceedings often prematurely reach the public ear. The executive sessions of our Senate are secret, but the newspapers generally manage in some mysterious way to find out all they ought to know.

Our post-office officials are human and curious, and hence severe statutes do not prevent frequent complaints of the opening of letters. It is evident that the chief reliance of the citizen for the secrecy of his business and private affairs must be upon the absence of any law, no matter how strict, compelling their disclosure to any one.

The people of this country nearly everywhere enjoy the privilege of a secret ballot, but they would regard that privilege as abridged and that secrecy as absolutely destroyed if the contents of their ballot were required to be exhibited to the inspectors, although such inspectors were sworn to secrecy and a disclosure were made a penal offense. It is immaterial to me how Senators, unmindful of the personal rights and liberties of the people, may regard the conceded inquisitorial features of this bill But it is a satisfaction to know that the best thought and the fairest minds of the nation are opposed to them.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Boyd vs. United States (116 U. S. Rep., 631) expressed its opinion of similar legislation in the following vigorous language:

> Any compulsory discovery, by extorting the party's oath or compelling the production of his private books and papers to convict him of a crime or to forfeit his property, is contrary to the principles of a free government. It is abhorrent to the instincts of an Englishman. It is abhorrent to the instincts of an American. It may suit the purposes of despotic power, but it can not abide the pure atmosphere of political liberty and personal freedom.

I commend these patriotic and pertinent utterances to the attention of the apologists for this bill.

The provisions of this bill violate the spirit of the constitutional provision which declares that "the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated."

The appliances of compulsory examination and inspection which the bill invokes render its provisions extremely odious and antagonize the citizens' sacred right of privacy. The recent experiences in South Carolina illustrate the difficulties often attending the enforcement of an unpopular law.

ELEMENTS OF INJUSTICE AND INEQUALITY.

The public should not be misled into the belief that only those whose incomes exceed $4,000 are affected by this bill. That is a mistaken idea.

In the first place, all those having incomes less than $4,000 but more than $3,500 are put to the annoyance of making sworn returns, and they neglect it at their peril. (See section 56.)

In the second place, it may reasonably be apprehended that some portion of the tax paid will reimburse itself by an increase of rents where the income was derived from that source. State taxes upon land regulate to some extent the amount of the rent demanded by the landlord. So poor tenants may be affected in some degree as well as rich landlords. The bill seriously affects the rights and interests, as they have been heretofore enjoyed, of building and loan associations throughout the country incorporated under State laws. The Senate amendments do not cure the defects complained of.

The salaries of State, county, and municipal officers are exempt (necessarily so, as is alleged), while the salaries of faithful employés in private employment—their next-door neighbors perhaps—are subject to the tax.

The professional man will feel more keenly the tax upon his salary than one whose income is derived from invested property.

At every point there is an element of injustice and inequality which renders an income tax indefensible except as a war tax. That portion of the act which provides for a tax upon live-stock, wool, butter, cheese, beef, etc., and general productions from real estate, "less the amount expended in the purchase or production of said stock or produce," and which allows "necessary expenses actually incurred in carrying on any business, occupation or profession," to be deducted in estimating the income, opens the door for evasions, virtual frauds, fictitious or extravagant expenses, overcharges, and a hundred different means whereby the income will be reduced, without actual fraud or perjury, and there is no practical remedy. The enforcement of the law will descend into a system of favoritism, will lead to endless litigations, and the revenues derived will be disappointing.

IT IS UNDEMOCRATIC AND UNJUST.

Let me inquire whence came this recent and unnecessary clamor for the imposition of an income tax as the policy of the Government? Nothing was heard in its behalf on the part of either of two great political parties in the campaign of 1892. Neither the Republican nor Democratic platform proposed any such method of raising revenues. No prominent Democrat or Republican suggested any such measure. Its approval was limited to the platform of the newly formed Populist party, and its advocacy was restricted to Populist orators.

But no sooner was the campaign of 1892 ended than we find it seriously proposed by a Democratic Congress to steal the thunder of the Populist party by adopting one of its principles. I object to becoming a particeps criminis in any such larceny. I protest against the Democratic party being made a tail to the Populist kite. I deny the right of a Democratic Congress to make new principles for our party not sanctioned by its representatives in national convention duly assembled.

We must look in vain to find a single utterance in favor of the scheme of Federal income taxation in any Democratic national platform from the organization of the Government down to the present hour. Yet in spite of this record this scheme has been injected into a revenue-tariff bill (so called) and the support of the measure as a whole is sought to be made the test of our Democracy. For one I repudiate any such doctrine and decline to recognize any such test.

The Constitution of the United States may well be invoked in this discussion.

A careful perusal of that instrument shows that its framers contemplated that the revenues of the Government should be mainly derived from duties upon imports.

It is true that the power to impose internal taxes and direct taxes was conferred upon Congress, together with the power to collect import duties, yet it was only the latter field of taxation that the States were forbidden to encroach upon.

Article I, section 10, subdivision 2, of the Constitution, provides as follows:

No State shall, without the consent of the Congress, lay any imposts or duties on imports or exports. * * *

This source of revenue being thus expressly and exclusively reserved for the General Government, while all other sources were permitted to remain open to the States, it indicates the intention of our early statesmen that the needs of the Government should be or were expected to be supplied practically from tariff taxation alone.

From that sole source they have always been supplied during all Administrations from the early history of the country, save during the war period, with the addition, however, since then of internal taxes upon liquors and tobacco (and one or two minor articles or sources), which for exceptional reasons, apparent to all, have been approved or tolerated. But aside from these exceptions the policy of the Government has been uniform in favor of taxation upon imports rather than internal taxation or direct taxes, as a means of supplying the necessary revenues.

PRESIDENT CLEVELAND ON RECORD.

President Cleveland in his second annual message in 1886 approved this course in the following language:

It has been the policy of the Government to collect the principal part of its revenues by a tax upon imports; and no change in this policy is desirable.

Yet the fact can not be disguised that notwithstanding these accumulated evidences of Democratic sentiment, the authors of this bill in the House deliberately set themselves at work to make extreme reductions, unnecessary changes, and violent alterations in existing tariff rates—rates not warranted by existing business conditions and lower than in the Mills bill—for the very purpose of creating a necessity for the imposition of a tax upon incomes.

DESIGNED AS A PERMANENT POLICY.

This proposed tax is not advocated as a temporary expedient; there is no limitation fixed to its duration, but it is boldly proposed as a permanent policy of the Government; its injustice is vigorously defended, its discriminations are heartily approved, and its illy-concealed sectionalism is unblushingly excused.

The Ways and Means Committee of the House, as well as the House itself and the Senate Finance Committee, refused to fix a definite term for the continuance of this tax.

It is clear that it was not designed for temporary relief merely, but if once enacted will stand, like every other portion of the bill, until repealed.

The country should not be deceived upon this subject, nor be misled by specious promises of relief not contained in the measure itself, nor indulge in the vain hope that if once established the clamor for its continuance will soon die out. The character of the speeches made in the House in its favor, the appeals of that portion of the press which favor it, and all the reasons which are publicly and privately urged for its enactment, proceed upon the theory that it ought to become and is intended to become a part of our permanent system of Federal taxation. That is the goal for which its friends are struggling, and they will be satisfied with nothing less.

The plain issue which we are to meet is indirect versus direct taxation.

Mr. Thomas G. Shearman, of Brooklyn, a theoretical reformer and an intelligent and earnest disciple of Mr. Henry George's single-tax theory, as well as an advocate of an income tax, began his able address before the Ways and Means Committee on October 16 last, as follows:

It is high time that some form of practically direct taxation should be resorted to by the Federal Government.

It should, however, be stated that Mr. Shearman opposed an individual income tax, but favored the taxation of incomes from certain corporate investments. I have not been informed who, if anybody, favored an individual income tax before that committee.

We do not contend that the system of taxation upon imports absolutely prevents all inequality or injustice. It is of course not a perfect system. Equal and exact justice to each individual citizen is not possible under any method of taxation likely to be devised. But Federal taxation upon foreign importations—taxation upon consumption, if you please—indirect taxation imposed upon what you buy and use—is preferable to direct taxation of any kind. The fathers of the Republic so regarded it when they adopted tariff taxation as the best means for securing Federal revenues. They may have been mistaken, and possibly we are wiser than they were.

But it has proved reasonably satisfactory for over a hundred years, producing ample revenues for the national necessities, except during the crisis of war, and no political party has ventured openly to declare for its total abandonment, and to propose direct taxes in place thereof. It answers a twofold purpose, to wit: First, the direct or principal purpose of providing revenue; second, the indirect or incidental purpose of protecting home producers, manufacturers, and laborers from ruinous foreign competition.

Revenue is the primary object of a tariff, and all else is merely secondary or incidental thereto.

I do not propose at this time to discuss the difference or the merits of the two policies arising out of tariff taxation, to wit, a tariff for revenue and a tariff for protection, the one the Democratic, the other the Republican policy. These points of dispute I am not now considering, but expect to do so at a future day.

The point which I am now endeavoring to make is that under tariff taxation in general, ample revenues have not only been derived, but at the same time the industries of the country have augmented, manufactures have prospered, workingmen have found remunerative employment, labor has been properly shielded from foreign competition, and the best and highest interests of the whole country have been subserved; many of which beneficent results would have been impossible under any system of internal or direct taxation.

In fact, I am here to declare my belief that the complete substitution of internal, direct, or income taxes for tariff taxes would prove utterly ruinous to the business interests of this country under existing conditions abroad. A partial substitution at this time would be proportionately disastrous.

This bill proposes a suicidal policy when it seeks by its extreme provisions to discard numerous reasonable tariff duties and thereby imperil many industries and create a deficiency in necessary revenues, simply for the purpose of affording an opportunity or excuse for the substitution of an income tax. There is an ample field for genuine tariff reform without a resort to such an unwise and dangerous experiment. Innumerable reductions in existing rates—reasonable and necessary reductions—are perfectly feasible, such as will not create any further deficiency nor jeopard a single industry.

WHAT IT MEANS.

The substitution of internal or direct taxes for custom-house taxation, means the reduction of the wages of American workmen to the European standards. It means the degradation of American labor; it means the deprivation to our workmen of the comforts and luxuries of life to which they have been accustomed.

Deny it or disguise it as we may, no other result is possible under existing European conditions. It is a self-evident proposition that well-paid labor can not successfully compete with underpaid labor. In Europe wages are low and labor is degraded; in America wages are high and labor is prosperous, elevated, and dignified. The General Government being vested with the exclusive power of custom-house taxation and the States being prohibited from resorting to it, the Government should exhaust that field before intrenching upon others.

Let me not be misunderstood. Not one dollar of tariff taxation should be imposed except what is necessary for the needs of the Government, economically administered; but whatever those needs are, the necessary revenues therefor should be supplied from tariff taxation and that alone, save and except the taxes upon liquors, oleomargarine, and tobacco, to which the country has long been accustomed, and which for obvious reasons need not be disturbed.

Such a policy is a reasonably consistent one, and should be continued. It would be manifestly unfair to the States to diversify Federal taxation. It is now condensed, simplified, and practically exclusive, and should remain so.

IT DUPLICATES TAXATION.

A Federal income tax involves multiple taxation in several States, where State income taxes already exist. This bill also proposes to tax the dividends of corporations and gifts and inheritances, which are already taxed under State laws in New York and many other States, thereby compelling such States to either abandon such form of taxation altogether or to enforce and sanction what would clearly be oppressive taxation. The duplication of taxes is always objectionable.

The threadbare argument is urged that wealth escapes taxation and that it can best be reached through an income tax. If this be true it does not necessarily require a Federal income tax. Let those States where wealth is believed to be insufficiently taxed reach that wealth through State income taxes or any other methods which their ingenuity can suggest, and no one outside of those States will be heard to object. Surely States which refuse to apply the means within their power to equalize, diminish, or render more equitable their own State and local taxation ought not to ask the assistance of the General Government to relieve them.

State and local taxation rather than Federal taxation comprises the principal burden of our taxpayers, and to each State is conceded the right to frame and execute its own tax laws, whereby it can compel the wealth within its own borders to contribute whatever share of taxation it may determine in its discretion to be proper.

This is all that any State can reasonably ask. Certainly no State can consistently demand that its own prerogatives shall be encroached upon and its own revenues imperiled by the General Government in order that the State's own wealth may not escape taxation.

FEDERAL VERSUS STATE AND LOCAL TAXATION.

The records of the Census Bureau show that in 1890 the State, county, and local taxation of the several States of the Union amounted in the aggregate to $470,476,927. The total Federal taxation (ord nary expenditures) for the last completed fiscal year (1893) only amounted to $383,477,954.49, and including extraordinary expenditures amounted to $461,916,561.94. Of this last sum only $205,355,016.73 were realized from customs. It is the custom-house taxation particularly which the friends of direct Federal taxation claim is not paid equally by the people, and is so burdensome to the poor man; and yet such taxation is not equal to one-half of the State and local taxation.

WHAT STATES WILL PAY THE TAX.

From 1863 to 1873 the former income tax extorted from the people an aggregate sum of $347,220,897.86. Of this sum the Eastern States paid 18 per cent, the Middle States 53 per cent, and together they paid 71 per cent. New York alone paid 3 per cent. It has not been claimed that these percentages will be materially changed if this bill becomes a law.

These figures speak louder than words. They are significant of the selfish purposes of this bill, the real motives behind it, and the source or section from which the votes necessary for its passage are expected to be secured.

Further comment becomes unnecessary. I will only add that I am not ashamed of the fact—on the contrary, I am proud of the fact—that New York is the wealthiest State in our Union; but I protest that this circumstance should not make her citizens the target of every vicious scheme which discriminates against her interests, and especially that the blow should not be struck by those political friends who have never appealed to her in vain when they have needed evidences of her friendship.

A STEP TOWARD SOCIALISM.

It is charged against the friends of a Federal income tax that they are artfully driving in the thin edge of a wedge to effect a forced redistribution of property.

Toward such a purpose, were it fixed in the minds of a majority of voters, the efficiency of every kind of an income tax is undeniable, whether applied in State laws to the profit of classes, or in a Federal law to the profit of sections.

I feel bound to concede that the sincere object of the great body of the friends of a Federal tax on incomes is not an experiment in socialism, is not a swift political suicide, but is the straightforward furtherance, after great discouragement and long delay—the furtherance of tariff reform.

The choice of a pivot for tariff reform in this bill responds to the firm tenacity of the people for relief, but not wisely. The choice follows, to be sure, a notable British precedent, but that precedent is quite irrelevant for America, where Federal and State taxes present no analogy to the foreign agglomeration of imperial and local taxation.

The British Kingdom is straining to-day in the pangs of decentralization. A Federal income tax would lay in the United States the great corner stone of future centralization. The choice of some pivot of tariff reform in the United States—that is, obtaining revenue from one source in order to discard revenue from another source—is a necessity. What pivot had best be chosen is pure expediency. The British choice may have been expedient in Great Britain. An identical or different choice in the United States needs to be shown expedient here. Alone serving the purpose, or best serving the purpose, of a pivot for tariff reform, must be the test of expediency for an income tax in the United States, even by those who deem it an inoffensive and lawful Federal tax.

It is obviously inexpedient, if unnecessary. Evidence that it is unnecessary for the purpose of its friends has been and is now offered to their consideration.

THE ENGLISH PRECEDENT.

Praises of an income tax which are quoted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from British books will be found upon inspection to be relative to the demerit of the discarded taxes. Mr. Gladstone himself desired to renounce the income tax after it had served its turn, conceding thus its injustice and inequality.

I do not misstate his position. The following letter written by him in 1892 to a London newspaper explains itself:

GLADSTONE'S OPINION OF THE INCOME TAX.

[From the London Pall Mall Gazette.]

I am not aware of any practicable method of reforming the inequalities and injustices of the income tax. For this reason, I with my colleagues proposed its abolition in 1874; but the country decided otherwise.

W. E. GLADSTONE.

JANUARY, 1892.

That statesman's act praises good tariff taxation over bad tariff taxation, and over income taxation, too. The United States can find, upon reflection, a better pivot of tariff reform, and one which will not need to be renounced for its own demerits. Praises of an income tax and theoretical arguments for it, quoted in the RECORD from the British treatises of political economy, will be found to rest on the assumption that it be the sole and single tax—that it be the exclusive means of defraying government expense, from the highest imperial to the lowest police functions, and that it tolerate no exemptions.

All such quoted arguments are obviously irrelevant here. No British statesman of rank, so far as I know, differs from Mr. Gladstone's opinion that, as a supplementary tax, the income tax in Great Britain, where upon constitutional grounds it is eligible, it is as indefensible as it is odious in time of peace, and that there it must find its only warrant in the necessities of war.

No American statesman of rank, except Mr. Cleveland, has deemed it eligible, since our war experience of an income tax made manifest that here too, in the Northern States, it was generally odious. It is a novelty in American politics to make its conclusions and procedures deliberately offensive. It is like making religion immoral and urbanity noisy, in order to commend and propagate them.

IT VIOLATES STATE RIGHTS.

No such Federal aggrandizement was ever projected—no such insidious and deadly assault upon State rights, State powers, and State independence, as a Federal income tax.

Mr. Calhoun would have thought it wasted breath to discuss the autonomy of States or the limits of their sovereignty under an income tax put up and put down by the Congress in Washington.

Praises of an income tax on the ground that it reaches accumulated wealth assume that such wealth goes untaxed unless reached by Federal laws. The assumption is absurd.

Arguments for a Federal income tax drawn from the existence of State taxes on incomes admit that accumulated wealth is reached without Federal laws and confess incroachment upon State sources of revenue.

Accumulated wealth looms up large in the imagination of the foreign socialist. His estimate of individual fortunes, published in New York newspapers, is always absurdly excessive. His moral quality is frankly betrayed in his constant preoccupation with the least noble possession of his fellow-creatures.

A better point of view for the American legislator is the fact that the total realized material wealth of the human race is computed by the best economists at less than four times its annual consumption. Every step of progress destroys wealth to recreate more. Old printing presses, old cotton-mill machines are worthless.

The constant personal redistribution of realized accumulated wealth is a commonplace of the moralists. But its physical and economical redistribution is even more swift and general. It can not escape taxation in the ceaseless consumption and reproduction which are the condition of its continuing to be wealth.

THE HOUSE ARGUMENTS.

To these income-tax arguments sifted from the debate in the House, I pay the respect of refutation, because of my entire sympathy with the tenacious purpose to advance tax reform, which is ostensibly behind them. But I must also beg permission very respectfully to warn the devoted champions of every Democratic aspiration not to neglect principles constitutional and economic which are deep-seated in the lifelong convictions of Northern Democrats, merely because of the omission of the present Executive to wholly share, remember, or represent them. No honest and clear-headed man can possibly define a direct tax in terms which shall be capable to exclude any sort of income tax from the circumscription of the definition.

Nobody ever had a doubt before the war that the constitutional inhibition, upon that ground alone, was peremptory and conclusive. I do not quarrel with the decision of the Supreme Court in the Springer case; but the doctrine may hereafter be repudiated by the present court. Such things have happened before.

The income tax proposed by the President, or that incorporated in the House bill, or any other sort of Federal income tax, is unsuitable for apportionment among the several States according to the census of their populations; and neither pretends to be uniform, applied to all the net income of each and every citizen, nor can be. Direct taxation, by definition, making argument superfluous, is taxation not shifted, distributed, and divided by repercussion.

A single tax on land has enlightened advocates on the ground that it would be distributed, divided, and repercussed with freedom and therefore with equity; that being advanced by the occupier of the land it would be distributed according to the use of the land, which use is variable while universal—thus resembling in this point a tax on sugar, for example, which being advanced by the importer, would be distributed according to consumption—another form of use, variable while universal.

Direct taxation, on the other hand, of which the poll tax and the tax on all incomes at one per centage are perfect illustrations, is like an acid which must eat where it falls.

Arguments for an income tax assert moreover that Congress is empowered to apply a rule of inequality and a principle of injustice in order to distribute the rewards of industry and thrift otherwise than they are distributed among men acting with individual freedom under equal laws. Such a grant of power to Congress has not yet been cited. But if such a grant of power, after long litigation were found there, or after the long process of constitutional amendment were put there, nevertheless the test first to be applied just now in the search for sources of revenue would preclude income taxation.

It is not the most immediate and most adequate remedy for the existing lack of revenues and would not aid the revival of our prostrate industries. It is not the best pivot of tariff reform. It jeopards genuine tariff reform for another decade.

AN UNWISE COURSE.

To double the deficit of $78,000,000 by way of ending it; to discard $76,000,000 of annual revenue in order to collect twice as much in other ways; to "embody tariff reform" as the President imagined himself to be doing in his scheme to substitute direct taxes for the tariff taxes which were to be reformed; to reconstruct all the schedules instead of amending or discarding one group at a time, the worst first and each upon its own demerits; to disturb and distress as many business men as possible and all at once, instead of few at a time, is not a programme perfectly matured and suited to conduct the policy and principle of tariff reform unimpaired through a period of general business prostration, public deficit, and private bankruptcy.

For my own part, as a Democrat, I prefer indirect taxation and tariff reform above direct taxes and tariff extinction. I prefer taxing foreign products rather than taxing home products. I follow Jefferson in regarding even the species of indirect taxation on home products by internal revenue war taxes as not good to be extended and the first to be rid of when their need is past.

In the language of the Democratic national platform of 1884:

> From the foundation of this Government taxes collected at the custom-house have been the chief source of Federal revenue. Such they must continue to be.

In the language of the New York Chamber of Commerce, January 12, 1894:

> The Chamber of Commerce * * * believe without distinction of party lines * * * that in addition to an internal-revenue tax now in force, the necessary expenses of the Government should be collected through the custom-house.

The President's proposal to invert the method of our Federal taxation runs precisely counter to the principle and the practice preferred by the founders of our Republic, and to which after every aberration the apostles of Democracy have led the return. But were all this otherwise, nevertheless, I would first and foremost consider how to add sufficient revenue best and soonest.

I would remember the captains of industry. I would remember the breadwinners. And if our Federal revenues, bottomed heretofore upon customs duties on foreign products, were hereafter to be bottomed upon taxes on home products and a few incomes, I could never counsel a President or a Congress to sound the tocsin of that revolution in the black midnight following a general slaughter-day of all private incomes.

THE FOREIGN PRECEDENTS.

The State Department through our consuls in Europe has made a collection of income-tax laws—every hideous octopus that is sucking out the life-blood of the people of Europe to support war navies and war armies—and fetches them over for model examples to this land of liberty, this continent of industrial peace. Fit models, fine examples! They have taught the draftsmen of this bill one lesson too many. They have taught the draftsmen of this bill with just what form of words to constitute a class of official highwaymen for blackmailing or plundering every man of property in the United States. Is that harsh? Then I say that were the teachers angels and the pupils better than the best of men, no form of words their wit could contrive would fail of spawning just that infamy. It is inherent, intrinsic; it sticks in the very nature of any Federal income-tax law whatever.

JEFFERSON'S SENTIMENTS.

Jefferson's Fontainebleau letter has been quoted in this discussion. That letter was written on the eve of the French Revolution. It was written in the presence of those awful social wrongs and the political inequality, injustice, and oppression from which that historic convulsion ensued. It is actually quoted as helpful authority by men favoring an income tax, in a century, a hemisphere, and a state where exists not one of all the affecting circumstances that Jefferson's kind heart grieved over, and his philosophic mind scanned all the darkening sky for peaceful methods to relieve.

The Fontainebleau letter reveals him anew in those powerful yet winning traits which make his life and character the admiration of every American. Indeed the most impressive argument against an American income tax is foreshadowed from his thrilling page. It is a fit "prologue to the swelling act of the imperial theme" of the great inaugural address.

OUR AMERICAN PRINCIPLES OF GOVERNMENT.

The United States of America have hitherto received and are now receiving from the best races of other States, nations, and empires, the tribute of a surpassing praise, without precedent in history—the praise of the desire of their young men and young women to assimilate their lives to ours, and their children's blood with the blood of our children, the praise of their desire to escape the burdens of past and future wars and be at peace, the praise of their desire to escape from the inequalities of privilege to an equality of rights, from European thrones, dominations, hierarchies, classes, and castes, political, ecclesiastical, or social, to an American individual liberty and civil equality, to our forms of government, founded upon popular elections, expressed in written constitutions, embodied in a permanent union of permanent States.

It may be impracticable that our distinctively American experiment of individual freedom should go on. Its novelty, as known by experience to the earlier immigration, can hardly be expected to receive full appreciation even from the most intelligent immigrants of the present generation. Our separation from the traditions and habits of thought of the Old World was so complete that the Declaration of Independence ratified an old fact rather than accomplished a new fact. The Constitution of the United States confirmed us in the possession of that independent tradition and a complete individual freedom.

The States which it united, the Federal Government which it established, are chiefly remarkable for their inhibitions of power, for their limitation of granted powers, for the strength and multiplicity of their safeguards of individual freedom. The sovereignty of the people, incontestible, possessed, fresh like the dew of morning in the beginning of our day and not like the dust and sweat of centuries of strife, was here first asserted and made manifest throughout the whole area of its jurisdiction, in its reservations and self-denials, in those limits set to its control, in those fortified safeguards of civil equality and individual liberty.

Perhaps it is a dream that such a paradise as we have possessed could be secure from change. The pick of the foremost races of mankind still are streaming hither, but now they bring another tradition. They come from that group of crowded, contiguous armed camps called Europe. They have not had training for generations in self-government. Some few have had a little training in getting possession of large governmental powers, existing and long used in disregard of popular rights. They have not had the habitude of popular sovereignty uncontested, popular rights enjoyed like air and water; they have not lived in civil equality and individual liberty like ours, guarded with eternal vigilance against the very governments our fathers' hands and our own have made, and put bounds to, and unweariedly repressed.

Across the water, among European peoples, human freedom enlarges, if it is enlarging, slowly. Out of armed camps not yet has grown a civil polity which refuses powers to the state in order to guard freedom for the man. State powers grow. If individual freedom anywhere is broadening there, its growth is subject to an inheritance from which we completely at one stroke escaped, and to hazards hitherto unknown by us. The growth of human freedom in Europe is subject to hazards from extensive, minute, searching, inquisitorial governmental powers, existing, organized, and predominant.

It is that sort of an inheritance, not our New World sort, which the peoples of Europe are called to administer, as one by one, after long wrestling with intermarried dynasties, through wars and revolutions, they succeed to the substance of sovereignty. Interferences with individual freedom are customary, and breed their own tradition. The governments are of militant and not industrial pattern. Their machinery is organized for repression; has had interference and control for means and end. That which was and is the interest of monarchies and aristocracies, in becoming the inheritance becomes the temptation and the hazard of their democracies.

THE WEAPON OF MONARCHIES.

Taxation of all sorts, taxation at every turn, taxation upon incomes, with all the necessary bureaucracy, machinery, and inquisition, has long been the appropriate and most perfected instrument with which European governments have multiplied their functions and prolonged their supervision, their control, their repression of the people's doings. While the founders of our democratic Republic, hiding the taxgatherers in a few seaboard custom-houses, bade them remember they were the people's servants and stick to an inoffensive obscurity, the taxgatherers of Europe became a fat official class, leaders of the local society, parasites, pupils, and servants to every occupant of a throne.

The leaders of the democracies who are approaching sovereignty slowly and clutching for the handle of every power whose edge they have felt, dreading the reaction that has followed confiscation of privileged estates, perceive, or think they see, in the taxation of incomes a safer and attractive weapon of redress. Instead of the settled supremacy here of man versus the state, there we see survivals of an earlier, almost a barbaric, phase of human progress, and the war of a class—the poor and the unprivileged—to capture the state in order to make reprisals upon another class, the privileged and the rich.

Taxation is even the favorite organ of more advanced Europeans who would bottle into the political and corporate structures of society those innumerable limitless fountains of social beneficence which here have found their widest, deepest flow through free lives from the free hearts of free men. So it happens that local troubles and a passing phase of the secular progress of Democracy in the Old World take on the aspect of socialism, whereas in this new world of United States our democracy has always been freedom.

OUR EUROPEAN ADVISERS.

The nonmigrating European feels a parental superiority and duty toward us. European professors announce to American professors, who publish and believe it, the birth of a brand new political economy for universal application. From the midst of their armed camps between the Danube and the Rhine, the professors with their books, the socialists with their schemes, the anarchists with their bombs, are all instructing the people of the United States in the organization of society, the doctrines of democracy, and the principles of taxation. Little squads of anarchists, communists, and socialists cross the ocean and would have us learn of them. No wonder, if their preaching can find ears in the White House.

An editor residing in Europe, of Hungarian birth, in his New York newspaper advocates an income tax designed ultimately to put upon nine States between Cape Cod and the Mississippi 77 per cent, and upon New York alone 30 per cent of the expenses of the Federal Government.

That taxation of incomes in the United States would be sectional and class taxation is precisely why it commends itself to some men of the European tradition. Their advocacy is sincere, and has one small excuse, that through our own stupidity and negligence some parts of our tariff schedules have been shaped to enrich a few Carnegies with texts for sermons on triumphant democracy and the best use of wealth.

If McKinleyism is socialism for the benefit of the rich, and income taxing is socialism for the benefit of the poor, no true American Democrat will look to the hair of the dog to cure his bite. American Democrats will reject socialism of both kinds.

THE AGGRANDIZEMENT OF GOVERNMENTS.

It is not to be overlooked, moreover, that the chief cost of our war of secession is accruing now, not so much in the pension list as in the usual war expansions and war aggrandizements of governmental power first usurped in the name of patriotic necessity, defended in the unrighteous decisions of courts, unrenounced by Congress, and tolerated because customary by the people.

Yet if all the expense of the Federal Government could be assessed upon the income of two hundred and fifty multimillionaires who would never know the difference, and if all their fortunes had been acquired otherwise than by free competition under equal laws, there could be no compensation for wrecking our American experiment of individual freedom by giving to the officers and taxgatherers of the Federal Government contact with the contracts, business, or property of individuals within the States.

In the official class our fathers saw the natural magnifiers of government and expanders of its functional areas. They eschewed its systematic domination and espionage. They gave the Federal taxgatherers no mission to draw up all things to a central head at this Capitol. They virtually dissolved that Old World institution, the standing army of tithe-takers. They eschewed direct taxes to punish thrift and penalize prosperity. They derived the revenues of the Federal Government from taxes levied at the seaboard upon things of foreign origin brought for consumption here. Thus avoiding every risk of duplicated or overlapping taxation, they left to the undiminished State, city, county, neighborhood authority, also undiminished all the great sources of revenue.

Europeanizing this America, the lovely cynosure of nations, would soon make it worth no man's while to climb the sea wall of our paradise. Its natural, almost unavoidable, invasion by foreign traditions, unfamiliar to our vital air of perfect liberty, is already great, continuous, increasing. While we welcome the immigrant, let us keep safe the inestimable though unvalued jewel of our great state. If we owe that which is unique in our American freedom to that which is unique in the partition, the limitation, the inhibition of government powers, let us now stand fast for the confines of that sovereignty "within whose circuit is Elysium."

THE PRACTICAL QUESTIONS.

The House bill created a deficiency in the revenues necessary for the Government.

It then became the duty of the Senate Finance Committee to supply that deficiency, which they proceeded to discharge. What were the questions which presented themselves to that committee at the outset of their endeavors and which now confront this Senate in its final action?

I conceive them to be these:

What imported articles, if tariffed, will best and soonest end the growing Treasury deficit, and so remove a chief hindrance to the release of capital and employ of labor? Can one or more be found from which revenue will be immediate, continuous, sufficient, of unquestioned legality so as not to be delayed by years of strife in the courts, of use and distribution universal, if possible, so that the burden may be least felt? Can the revenue therefrom be collected in the lump at the seaboard, and final payment made by 66,000,000 consumers at the most convenient time and way, namely, just before consumption in a small addition to its price?

Can the whole addition to the price of the tariffed article beyond its price if not tariffed, being all the tax, go to the Federal Treasury, without abatement, stop the growing deficit and release the deadlock of our industrial energies? I would hazard no steps in the mere revision of taxation except secure and solid steps, each one justified by the result of the previous step, and accompanied every one by the confidence of the mass of the people instead of by their dread and fear. If my counsels were heeded I would surprise and satisfy the country by the conservatism of our progress in revenue reform. The McKinley bill lost the country to our opponents by its extreme features in one direction, and we should avoid the opposite extreme.

TAX ON CONSUMPTION.

"Tax on consumption" is another current phrase that shuts off light. It puts blinders on men and prevents their seeing how many considerations should have weight in choosing a tariff tax, and that if a tax be a tax on consumption, that is no reason for rejecting it, even if there were twenty good reasons for rejecting it on other grounds.

All tariff taxes, and ninety-hundredths of all possible internal-revenue taxes, are taxes on consumption. The time of consumption varies. An anchor may take twenty years—an orange two minutes. Just as the correlative of buying is selling, just as the counterpart of money is commodity, so the correlative of consumption is production, and in each of these two correlatives is the other's being, end, and aim. It is to consume that we produce; it is to produce that we consume. Neither process can be stayed, yet a man live, or a state, or the race.

Whereabouts in the eternal round shall we tap for taxation?

How plain it is now, when a mere phrase no longer shuts off vision, that for purposes of taxation toward the public expense and general welfare, consumption should be tapped and not production. Increased production of whatever is good and necessary for consumption is palpably everybody's interest. Other things being equal, price falls as production increases, making consumption less costly. Wants are satisfied by production, and nobody can contract himself out of everybody's similar interest in its increase.

But there is no such universal and similar interest of everybody in anybody's consumption. That is the individual's affair, and his consumption offers the least injurious point of taxation for him in every individual case. Another merit of taxes on consumption is that they are surmounted in detail, and paid at the will of the consumer in the enhancement of price. If noted, they are self-assessed, with the least inconvenience at the best time, in the smallest sum; or they are declined and avoided without illegality.

If a thing were homogeneous, and its consumption were universal, if its bulk were considerable but its cost small, such qualities combined would make that thing the most perfect distributor, through voluntary consumption, of an equitable taxation. Assuredly in our Federal Government we may well regard a distributive equality as the best character of its taxation, leaving to State, municipal, and local taxation exemptions of burdens which, as varying from the general mass of our citizenship and property, or for reasons apart from revenue, or for considerations other than common and equal to all, local authorities with local knowledge and closer watch-care for any exceptional purpose may impose.

THE HOUSE VERSUS THE SENATE.

The Finance Committee, in their effort to modify the House bill so as to realize a sufficiency rather than a deficiency of revenue, selected sugar as one of such articles deemed proper for tariff taxation, and provided for a moderate duty thereon. I do not question the wisdom of their present action. But such conclusion should have been followed by an elimination of the income tax rendered doubly unnecessary by the imposition of a sugar duty.

It is difficult to reconcile the House bill with correct principles of revenue reform or with the previously expressed sentiments of some of its authors. The cultured chairman of the Ways and Means Committee [Mr. WILSON] in his article published in the North American Review of January last, criticising the McKinley bill, said as follows:

> Raw sugars were our chief revenue-producing articles on the customs list, and so it (the McKinley law) wiped out the duties upon them with the virtuous cry of "a free breakfast table for the workingmen." Both these taxes (tobacco and sugar) were in a just and proper sense revenue taxes. The tobacco tax should not have been touched, because it went directly into the Treasury from the pocket of the taxpayer and was burdensome upon no one. The sugar tax might very properly have been reduced, but should not have been entirely abolished, because of all the items in the tariff it carried the largest proportionate amount of what the people paid into the Treasury.

Yet the House bill which bears Mr. WILSON'S honored name actually followed the McKinley bill in rejecting a duty upon raw sugars.

In that same article Mr. WILSON mildly advocated a corporate income tax, but did not favor an individual income tax. In speaking of the latter he admitted that it would be "universally evaded" and "easily lend itself to fraud, concealment, and perjury," and its administration would be "necessarily accompanied by some exasperating and some demoralizing incidents." He favored a corporate income tax because "such a tax would not be a tax upon individual thrift, energy, or enterprise, but in the main upon the earnings of invested capital."

Mr. WILSON, in his eloquent speech in the House on February 1 last, admitted that he "had some doubt as to the expediency of a personal income tax at this time," and expressly stated that he "did not concur in the policy of attaching an income tax to the tariff bill."

Yet in spite of his own personal judgment and evidently sincere protestations, an individual income tax, which taxed not only "invested capital" but also "individual thrift, energy, and enterprise"—was actually attached to this tariff bill, and Mr. WILSON was persuaded to support it.

NO CLASS SHOULD PAY ALL THE TAXES.

I have no patience with the demagogic clamor which is constantly demanding that the rich shall pay all the taxes.

Those who thoughtlessly repeat this cry need to be reminded that this Government is not a plutocracy, but a Republic. Here manhood suffrage almost universally prevails, and property qualifications for political positions of honor and trust are nearly everywhere prohibited. The highest positions in the land are open to the aspirations of the poorest and most obscure youth anywhere to be found.

It is fitting that it should be so. But the poor man who owns no real estate or personal property pays nothing directly toward State, county, or municipal taxation—nothing toward the free schools which his children attend, nothing toward the maintenance of the highways over which he travels, nothing toward the expenses of the courts where his rights are vindicated and his wrongs redressed, nothing for lighted streets, police protection, public hospitals, jails, or almshouses, and nothing for the church at which he worships, because here we have no established religion; and if it were not for custom-house taxation—taxation upon consumption—he would pay not a farthing toward the support of the Government which protects him and under which he enjoys the blessings and privileges of a free and independent citizen.

It is through this much-abused system of tariff taxation—much abused by its enemies, and misused or carried to extremes sometimes by its friends—that we are enabled to equalize somewhat the burdens of government. It may be safely asserted as an equitable principle, involving no hardship to anyone, that citizens without ownership of real estate or taxable personal property, constituting the most numerous class in every community, and who pay no State or local taxes, ought to contribute something toward the expenses of the General Government under which they live; and to enforce the performance of such patriotic obligation the system of indirect taxation based on duties upon foreign imports affords the least offensive method.

If the contention that the rich should pay all the taxes and the poor be exempted therefrom is well founded, then it may well be urged that the rich should monopolize the suffrages and offices of the country.

The very fact that every citizen is obliged to contribute something, no matter how little, toward the expenses of government, whether he owns property or not, fortifies his right to the elective franchise and augments his claim for political preferment. He should regard it as a privilege conferred upon him, a shield against political ostracism; it increases his dignity and influence; and he naturally takes a keener interest in public affairs. The true welfare of the community is subserved by this system of indirect taxation which reaches all, but oppresses none.

I am opposed to any income tax which wholly or in part proposes to supersede this wise and useful method of taxation.

In the year 1875–'76 a commission of most distinguished and reputable gentlemen appointed by the governor of New York reported to the Legislature of that State in favor of a scheme of municipal government whereby only those who owned property and paid local taxes should be entitled to vote for the municipal officers vested with the control or disbursement of public funds.

It was plausibly argued that citizens who contribute nothing to the support of the municipality ought not in common fairness to be permitted to control its improvements, to authorize its public works, or to spend its revenues, while the class who pay all the municipal taxes, if in the minority, are compelled to acquiesce. The argument, if carried out to its legitimate conclusion, would favor a plutocratic, rather than a democratic, form of government, and additional weight would attach to it if citizens who pay no local taxes should also be exempt from all Federal taxation.

It is a significant fact that the Constitution, which requires no property qualification and recognizes manhood suffrage, should at the same time provide for tariff taxation as a source of revenue which is set apart exclusively as the property or function of the General Government, and conveying the idea that such suffrage and indirect tariff taxation were intended to be inseparable—one to mitigate or to justify the other.

THE POPULATION VERSUS THE TAXPAYERS.

The comptroller of the city of New York semiofficially informs me that the number of individual taxpayers in the city of New York is about 109,000. Yet that city has a population of 1,801,739 according to the State census of 1892, and of 1,515,301 according to the Federal census of 1890.

The disproportion between taxpayers and population may not be so large in some other cities, but it is believed that in almost every city and section of the country the population is ten times greater than the number of individual taxpayers. The fact that nine-tenths of our population pay nothing directly toward State, county, and local taxation adds force to the argument that they should continue to be reached indirectly through tariff legislation.

NO NEED OF AN INCOME TAX.

The next point which I desire to submit is that the necessities of the Treasury do not require an income tax. This proposition can be easily and clearly demonstrated.

The Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report estimates that the amount needed for the support of the Government for the next fiscal year will be $448,306,789.93. He also estimates that upon the basis of existing laws the revenues for the same period will be as follows:

From customs	$190,000,000.00
From internal revenue	160,000,000.00
From miscellaneous sources	20,000,000.00
From postal service	84,427,748.44
Total estimated revenues	451,427,748.44

Permit me to observe at the outset that this (Wilson) bill as it passed the House, discarded existing tariff revenue to the amount of $73,680,418 80, as accurately figured by Treasury experts. Senator VOORHEES in his speech states the amount to be $76,670,000, and for the purposes of this discussion we will assume the latter amount to be correct. This large reduction created a deficiency in the amount absolutely necessary to be realized for the support of the Government. The Ways and Means Committee recognized that fact and in their report to the House accompanying the tariff portion of this bill declared that they intended thereafter to provide "internal-revenue taxation, which will make up any deficit of public revenue." (See their report of December 19, 1893.)

Thereafter and before the bill passed the House, the income tax ($30,000,000) and an additional tax on spirits ($10,000,000) were added, but even this increase left a large deficiency, according to then official estimates.

Yet many overzealous friends and impatient newspapers demanded that the Senate should immediately pass this bill—with its conceded defects—exactly as it came from the House, regardless of the embarrassments to the Government which it might hereafter create.

With them a surplus or deficiency was an entirely immaterial consideration.

The Senate Finance Committee, realizing the insufficiency or inadequacy of this bill, proceeded to amend it by making provision for additional revenue. The able chairman of that committee, in his recent speech, said:

> The criticisms which assailed the bill as it came from the House because it created a deficiency in the Treasury no longer apply. We present a measure full freighted with revenue for every call that can be made on the Republic at home and abroad, and with a surplus besides of $29,389,345.

According to this statement the bill has "jumped out of the frying pan into the fire." From a deficiency there has arisen an immoderate surplus. One extreme has been succeeded by another. The committee made many changes, taking sugar, iron, coal, lead, and other articles from the free list and making them dutiable, and providing for a tax upon sugar estimated by official experts to realize $41,822,623.61, and an additional tax on spirits from which $10,000,000 is anticipated. Yet, notwithstanding these large additions of revenue sources to the bill, the committee still retained the income tax.

Let us see how the figures now stand. Secretary Carlisle's estimate in his annual report was as follows:

Expenditures.

Civil and miscellaneous	$86,795,460.92
War	47,173,203.65
Navy	27,875,914.02
Indians	6,931,156.61
Pensions	162,631,570.00
Interest	26,500,000.00
Postal service, etc	90,399,485.33
Total	448,306,789.93

Here are the revenues expected to be realized under this bill:

Receipts.

Internal revenue (under existing laws)	$160,000,000.00
Postal (under existing laws)	84,427,766.00
Miscellaneous (under existing laws)	20,000,000.00
Customs under pending bill as estimated by Treasury experts, including $41,822,623.61 for sugar duties	103,331,000.00
Additional internal revenue to pending bill, as follows:
Income tax	30,000,000.00
Spirits	20,000,000.00
Cards	3,000,000.00
Total	480,788,766.00

Summary statement.

Receipts	$480,788,766.00
Expenditures	448,306,789.00
Balance	32,481,977.00

These figures thus show an excess of revenue over expenditures of $32,481,977, being $3,092,732 larger surplus than admitted in Senator VOORHEES's unofficial statement.

They establish the fact that the proposed income tax, estimated at $30,000,000, is not required for any legitimate purposes of the Government.

An amendment to the bill striking out that tax would still leave a surplus of $2,481,977.

Besides, it is now apparent that the estimate of $162,631,570 for pensions contained in Mr. Carlisle's report was inaccurate, and may be safely reduced to $140,000,000 or $145,000,000. Senator VOORHEES's speech virtually concedes as much, and his own statement of the sum required reduces the amount to $145,000,000 (see CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 26, No. 92, page 4157), being $17,631,570 less than previous estimates, which sum added to the $32,481,977 surplus before mentioned makes a total surplus of $50,113,547 under this bill as amended by the Finance Committee.

Upon reflection it may be confidently asserted that the pension expenditure for the next fiscal year will not exceed $140,000,000, as there has been a steady decrease of late under the present vigilant administration of our pension laws. The expenditures for the first nine months of the present year have been only $107,151,496, and at that rate for the remaining three months the amount for the whole year will be only $142,858,661. A conservative estimate, therefore, would deduct the further sum of $5,000,000 (over and above the $17,631,570 previously deducted) from the amount originally announced, which should be added to the surplus already assured ($50,113,547), making a grand total of $55,113,547. Mr. Edward Atkinson estimates that the amount required for pensions for 1894–'95 will not exceed $135,000,000.

The situation, then, may be summarized as follows:

Receipts under Senate bill	$480,788,766.00
Expenditures for fiscal year 1895	425,675,219.00
Total surplus	55,113,547.00
Deduct income tax	30,000,000.00
Surplus without income tax	22,113,547.00

If Mr. Atkinson is correct, then, $5,000,000 more may be added to this surplus.

Two points should not be overlooked bearing upon the question of increased revenues: First, that under these figures no allowance has been made for the possibility of increased importations under reduced duties; second, no allowance has been made for the probability of such increase under anticipated revived conditions of trade. Neither of these important considerations can well be ignored.

The estimates of importations anticipated under this bill are based upon the actual importations during the last complete fiscal year ending June 30, 1893. The extreme duties imposed under the existing McKinley law during that year are alleged to have largely prevented importations which would otherwise have been received or at least been possible under lower duties. Of course, enormous duties—oftentimes styled prohibitory duties—tend to prevent importations, while experience has shown that frequently the imposition of lower duties has increased the revenues by materially increasing the importations.

Commercial depression naturally diminishes importations, as it blocks the wheels of trade and invites economies of every character. The latter half of the fiscal year 1892–'93 was largely affected by the monetary panic, and it is not unreasonable to believe that the business disturbances incident thereto may have materially diminished the importations from what they otherwise would likely have been.

No official nor semiofficial estimates have been furnished us—nor have I undertaken to make any figures at this time—of the increased revenues which may reasonably be anticipated under this bill, as now amended, on account of the two considerations which I have mentioned. It is sufficient, however, to declare that large increases of revenue are probable, which will swell the surplus to huge proportions if the income tax or the sugar tax shall still be retained. Neither have I ventured to consider the economies and reforms which are likely to be instituted in the various departments of the Government, and which are always probable under a Democratic Administration, from which large reductions in expenditures may be expected.

Mr. President, these figures which I have submitted speak for themselves. They demonstrate that the only plausible ground upon which the income tax was first sought to be imposed, to wit, that it was actually needed to meet the necessities of the Government, has been thoroughly exploded.

This is not my individual conclusion alone. The country so regards it.

Mr. Edward Atkinson, of Massachusetts, a distinguished political economist, in a recent article to the Boston Herald, in speaking of the Senate amendments to this bill says:

> The pretext that an income tax may be needed to cover a deficiency that would otherwise occur therefore falls to the ground.

Concerning this tax, he then adds that—

> Economically considered, I deem it a war tax of last resort when all the other sources have failed.

If in the face of these facts—if in the light of these figures—if in spite of the honest and sincere opposition which this tax naturally engenders from the people of that great section of the country which I have the honor in part to represent on this floor—a people as patriotic, as loyal, as generous, and as philanthropic as those of any other section, I repeat if notwithstanding these things which ought surely in common fairness to lead to the elimination of this obnoxious feature of this bill, its retention shall still be insisted upon by the unwise and misguided and assumed champions of tariff reform in this Congress, and defeat shall await the whole bill, let the responsibility fall upon the heads of those where it properly belongs.

A DEFENSE OF NEW YORK'S BUSINESS MEN.

I listened the other day with considerable interest to the distinguished Senator from Indiana in his fierce denunciations of the people in this country who have been fortunate enough to accumulate a competence. He nearly exhausted the vocabulary of abuse in the anathemas which he hurled against them.

He rebuked their "narrow and corroding selfishness," their "dangerous pretensions and intolerable arrogance;" he described their "brutal dictation;" he upbraided "their unjust, relentless, unsparing, and insolent" conduct; he pictured their wealth as the "illegitimate offspring of governmental paternalism," and characterized them as without "gratitude or love of country;" he imputed to them an intention and willingness to commit perjury and other crimes "for which the convict stripes of the penitentiary are the only punishment," and then having summarily adjudged them guilty without court or jury he declares them to be "fit associates for thieves, housebreakers, forgers, and cutthroats," and not satisfied with this terrible humiliation which he inflicted upon them, and notwithstanding his well-known amiable and forgiving disposition, with one fell swoop he consigned them all "to everlasting hell."

Then, Mr. President, he calmly and seriously said to us, "I am loth to say these things." He need not have given us that assurance; of course, we all keenly realized it. We knew with what reluctance he assumed his unpleasant task, and with what lack of eagerness he embraced the afforded opportunity. Mr. President, these violent and unseemly denunciations—these arguments, if they can be dignified as such—may answer for the hustings of Indiana, but I regret to hear them in the Senate of the United States.

Notwithstanding this terrible arraignment of the men of wealth, to which I have briefly alluded, I venture to speak a few words in their defense. I speak more especially of the men of means of my own State. I can not, of course, speak for those of Indiana—they may be all that they are painted by the senior Senator from that State. While, however, I doubt that fact, I have such respect for him and his statements that I can not safely contradict him. The men of wealth of New York, as a general rule, are among our best, most esteemed, and reputable citizens. They are not the vile rascals they have been depicted, and their riches have not been acquired by questionable means, governmental favors, usury, nor extortion.

Some inherited their wealth from honorable ancestors, others obtained it by fortunate investments; others by great business ability, tremendous industry, and remarkable sagacity. They have largely contributed to the greatness and glory of the State, building up its industries, augmenting its commercial supremacy, sustaining its finances, and assisting its great and varied undertakings.

The strong and solid financial institutions which they control, the great life and fire insurance companies which they manage, the admirable loan and trust associations which they direct, the magnificent lines of railroads which they operate, not only in New York, but elsewhere, the splendid manufactories which they conduct, wherein tens of thousands of working men and women are employed in honest labor, the immense shipping interests which they represent, the tremendous wholesale and retail establishments of trade which they maintain, and the hundreds of other business enterprises of vast magnitude which they honorably and successfully manage, are the evidences of their ability, their genius, their prudence, and their integrity.

The institutions of learning which they have founded, of which Cornell University, Vassar College, Cooper Institute, Vanderbilt University are conspicuous instances; the public libraries which they have endowed, of which the Astor Library, the Lenox Library, the Tilden Library are notable examples; the free hospitals which they have instituted, of which the Roosevelt Hospital, the Arnot-Ogden Hospital, and scores of others throughout my State which do not now occur to me—all these benefactions attest their widespread and noble generosity, and disprove the contemptible charge of their supreme "selfishness."

Whenever famine, pestilence, or fire has afflicted their countrymen in any locality or section of the Union, the wealthy business men of New York always speedily came to the rescue and liberally responded.

In great political campaigns, when the life of political parties has been deemed to be at stake, even Indiana and some portions of the South have not refused assistance from the wealthy partisans of New York.

When the nation's credit is in peril and funds are needed to meet the daily wants of its Treasury, and it must borrow from its citizens, where else except to the bankers of New York does your Secretary of the Treasury with confidence apply?

When the country's very life was in danger, when the fate of the Government hung trembling in the balance, when money was sorely needed to defend the Union, what subscribers to the nation's securities more quickly and cheerfully responded in the hour of emergency than the moneyed men of my State?

Mr. President, I need say no more. This speaking in defense of wealth is a new rôle to me. The record of my official life shows that my public utterances as well as services have usually been in other directions—in defense of the poor, in vindication of the oppressed, and for the amelioration of labor. I have no entangling alliances nor particular sympathies with those at whom this income-tax scheme is principally aimed; they have never been any especial friends of mine. But I trust that I am fair-minded and broad-minded enough to defend any class of my fellow-citizens—rich or poor, high or low, white or black, native or naturalized—whose fair fame is unjustly assailed, or whose rights are threatened, and whose interests are endangered by what I believe to be hostile and vicious legislation.

I have yet to learn that poverty is a cardinal virtue and that wealth is an abominable crime. All classes have their rights, and one class must not be permitted to encroach upon the other. The demagogue who seeks to stir up class prejudices and class resentments in order to win the gratitude or the applause of the mischievous and the unthinking, who are essentially his dupes, deserves only execrations at the hands of all right-minded men.

THE TILDEN INCOME-TAX CASE.

A moment since I mentioned the Tilden library. This reminds me of the fact that the distinguished citizen and Democrat—whose memory we all revere—Samuel J. Tilden, one of the wealthy men of New York who generously donated his millions to the establishment of a great free public library—a portion of which fund, however, it was only deprived through the technicalities of the law—was himself the victim of the injustice, the oppression, and the persecution permissible under an income tax.

We have not forgotten the annoyances to which this venerable apostle of Democracy was subjected, the opprobrium which he endured, the bitter litigations and prosecutions which he encountered at the hands of a few unscrupulous political opponents vested with a little brief authority, in their pretended enforcement of the law, endangering his feeble health and embittering his old age.

It was not enough that he had been deprived of the Presidency, to which a majority of a quarter of a million of the popular vote had desired to elevate him—deprived because of the crimes of fraudulent and purchased returning boards in three States, but he must be branded and denounced as a wealthy and selfish politician seeking to fraudulently evade the payment of his just share of governmental taxation.

And now, within less than ten years after his lamented death, we are told by these new apostles of Democracy that this Populist rider to a revenue tariff bill, with all the enormities and inquisitorial features which pertain to it, is the very quintessence of modern Democracy, and without which all else is valueless.

THE TRUE ENEMIES OF TARIFF REFORM.

The enemies of tariff reform are those who imperil the passage of this bill by arbitrarily insisting upon the retention of an income tax therein. They refuse to present a separate measure embracing this feature. They even decline to fix any date—one, two, or three years—when the income tax shall cease, but they seek to incorporate and establish it as a permanent policy of the Government.

They shut their eyes to the fact that a believer in tariff reform is not necessarily a believer in an income tax. A tariff tax is altogether a different matter from an income tax. They are neither identical, homogeneous, nor consistent with each other. Tariff reform means tariff reduction—not tariff extinction nor direct nor internal taxation. These widely divergent methods should not be confused nor conglomerated. The first notable effort for tariff reform since the war was embodied in the Morrison bill; but there was no suggestion of an income tax.

Then came the famous tariff message of President Cleveland, which simply invited a reduction of tariff duties to prevent a further surplus, but there was no recommendation for the restoration of war taxes, to wit, taxes upon incomes. Then followed the Mills bill, which passed a Democratic House of Representatives, and was distinctly approved by the national Democratic convention of 1888, but nothing was heard of any income tax. But now at this late day, after a third party has adopted it as its shibboleth, we are told that it is the sine qua non of tariff reform and true Democracy. I deny the right of any man, without the sanction of a national convention, to add this new tenet to the Democratic faith.

OUR DUTY.

Mr. President, I do not need to be reminded that it is the duty of the present Congress to revise the tariff. I appreciate that fact as keenly as any Senator here. We are pledged to that course; the country expects it. We are pledged to a tariff for revenue; we are not pledged to pass an income tax. We are pledged to pass a tariff measure which will produce sufficient revenue for the support of the Government, not one insufficient for that purpose.

We have no moral right to deliberately discard seventy-six millions of tariff revenue and thereby create a deficiency to be supplied by other and more objectionable taxation. That is not reform; it is folly, it is impotency, it is scarcely less than criminal under the existing conditions of the country. It is experimenting with and hazarding all our vast and varied business interests now demanding our watchful care.

MY POSITION BRIEFLY STATED.

I stand ready to support any reasonable measure for tariff reform framed within the lines and based upon the principles which I have here partially indicated, and which were fully set forth in my speech in opening the political campaign in Brooklyn on September 19, 1892. I stand to-day where I stood then. I have nothing to add and nothing to retract.

I will cheerfully vote for the Mills bill, and join with you in making many material reductions of duties therein. I am ready to waive all minor differences of details which do not involve a question of principle.

Having spoken to-day especially upon the income-tax feature of this bill, I reserve the expression of my views upon its other features until near the close of the discussion.

CONCLUSION.

Mr. President, this is an important crisis in the history of the Democratic party. The failure of tariff revision at this time means the defeat, the demoralization, if not the division and annihilation of our party. Moreover, it means, as we believe, injury to the best interests of the country. Let those who insist upon injecting into this bill this odious and un-Democratic feature of an income tax—a relic of war legislation—pause and reflect upon the possible consequences of their unwarrantable demands.

They should realize that it means the loss of the control of this Senate, now nearly equally divided between the two great parties; it means the loss of the next House of Representatives; it means the loss of the electoral votes of New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, and probably every Northern State; and finally, it means the loss of the next Presidency and all that it implies. They should recollect that this income-tax feature is justly regarded in New York and many other Northern States as a scheme of spoliation, an unwarranted sectional attack upon their citizens of means.

They should consider whether there is anything about an income tax so sacred, so desirable, so popular, so just, and so defensible that its maintenance is worth the risk which they are precipitating. Let them remember 1860 and the ultra demands then made upon the Democratic party, to which it could not honorably accede; demands which led to our division and defeat; let them remember the triumphs of our opponents, the civil war that followed, the devastation, the suffering, the humiliation which ensued, the military and carpet-bag governments which flourished, the force bills which threatened, and all the incidents of the terrible years which darkened our party's and our country's history from 1860 to 1884, when, through wiser counsels, moderate action, conciliatory methods, and restored confidence, we were intrusted with power again; and, reflecting upon all these things, let them say whether it is the part of wisdom, by the insistence upon extreme demands, to imperil the success of our party again, and thereby tend to retard the progress, diminish the glory, and endanger the best and highest interests of our common country.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I ask that the bill may now be read.

Mr. GRAY. Let the bill be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ALDRICH. I desire to ask of the Chair what reading of the bill it is that is called for by the Senator from Tennessee, and then I desire from the Chair and from the Senator from Tennessee their idea of the statns of the bill at the present moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will answer the Senator. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The Senator from Tennessee heretofore asked unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with, to which objection was interposed. The debate thus far has proceeded by unanimous consent, without the reading of the bill. The Senator from Tennessee now calls for the reading of the bill, which the Chair holds to be in order.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Chair decide that it is the first reading of the bill which is now to be had?

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Chair allow me to make a suggestion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear the Senator.

Mr. HARRIS. I suppose there has not been an instance in the history of this Government where the Senate has considered a bill until the bill has been read to the Senate. It is true that the pending bill has been read by title a first and second time, that it was referred to the Committee on Finance, and was reported back to the Senate; but the experience of the Senator from Rhode Island every hour of every day since he has been in the Senate has been that when a bill is to be considered, the Chair announces that "the bill is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and will be read at length." The Senate is not presumed to proceed to consider a bill until it has been read.

There are many instances in voluminous appropriation bills where unanimous consent has been asked to dispense with the formal reading of the bill, but except in cases where unanimous consent has been obtained, bills are always read as in Committee of the Whole. When the pending bill was laid before the Senate just a week ago to-day, I asked that its formal reading be dispensed with, in order that the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] might at once proceed with the remarks he proposed to submit. That request was objected to by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. Then I asked that the Senator from Indiana might proceed and the bill be read after he concluded his remarks, for which request unanimous consent was granted, and the debate has proceeded by unanimous consent up to this hour.

I now demand, according to the uniform custom of the Senate, that the bill be read.

Mr. HALE. Before the Senator sits down let us see what he is trying to get at and what he gains by this formal reading. Every bill before it passes is entitled to three readings. It takes its first and second readings formally, nominally, and is reported to the Senate, as this bill has been. Rule XV provides, and I ask the attention of the Chair to it:

1. All bills and joint resolutions which shall have received two readings—

As this bill has—shall first be considered by the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, after which they shall be reported to the Senate; and any amendments made in Committee of the Whole shall again be considered by the Senate, after which further amendments may be proposed.

All to be done before the third technical parliamentary reading is reached. Does the Senator from Tennessee, an old and accomplished parliamentarian, expect by a formal reading of this bill now to put it in such a state that it can not be amended afterwards?

Mr. HARRIS. By no means, nor is any such thing possible.

Mr. HALE. I wanted to get that answer, because, crediting the Senator not only with a knowledge of parliamentary law, but with candor and fairness in his methods, it did not seem possible that that was what he sought. Then the Senator does not claim that the reading of this bill now will be in any sense one of the three technical readings?

Mr. HARRIS. I do not, but the Senator from Maine knows, as I know and as every other Senator knows, that the third and last reading of a bill is invariably by title, as are the first and second readings.

Mr. HOAR. That is only by consent.

Mr. HARRIS. Of course, by consent. But when the pending bill shall have been read, as all bills are read as in Committee of the Whole, then there is not a line of it that is not open to amendment.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator claim that, by the formal reading on the part of the Secretary any right to offer or consider amendments as reached would be wholly cut off?

Mr. HARRIS. On the contrary, I wholly disclaim any such idea.

Mr. HALE. Then what does the Senator gain by his demand?

Mr. HARRIS. When the bill has once been read, every line of it, as I before stated, will be open to amendment, and then every Senator will be at liberty to select the precise line or point at which he proposes to amend. We shall have accomplished that much, however. When the bill has been formally read, as all bills are formally read when considered as in Committee of the Whole, it will be read no more except by title, but every Senator will have a right to offer amendments to any section, to any provision, to any line of the bill. The suggestion I have made does not affect the right of amendment in the slightest degree.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator has two or three times stated that the future readings of the bill will be by title and that is, of course, according to the ordinary custom of the Senate; but I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee if he claims that any reading of a bill whatever can be by title if its full reading is demanded by any Senator?

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I quite agree with the Senator from Massachusetts. If that Senator shall upon the third reading of the bill demand that every line of it be read, I think he has the right to make the demand, and it will be the duty of the Chair to so order; but the bill must be read. In every appropriation bill, where the formal reading has been dispensed with by unanimous consent, the reading has proceeded line by line and paragraph by paragraph, and amendments have been considered generally by unanimous consent while the bill was being read. All of that, however, is by unanimous consent.

I now demand that the pending bill be read. When it has been read, the Chair doubtless will announce that "the bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment," and every line of it will be subject to amendment. Senators need not apprehend the remotest possibility of my undertaking to object to any legitimate amendment or any amendment which is in order, for I concede to the fullest and broadest extent that the bill is amendable.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Chair will permit me, before he makes a final decision upon this question, I should like to say a few words upon what has been uniformly the practice of the Senate in cases of this kind.

I will say that perhaps on the surface the rules and the practice of the Senate are somewhat in conflict. I have had, as the Senator from Tennessee has had, more or less experience in the treatment of tariff bills in the Senate, and without exception, within my knowledge, which goes back to 1883, whenever bills of this nature have been before the Senate, they have always been considered by paragraphs for amendment the first formal reading of the bill having always been dispensed with by unanimous consent for that purpose; but I supposed that when that stage was reached, when what is called in the other House "general debate" should be closed, this bill would be taken up and read by paragraphs, dispensing with the first formal reading for amendments, and then that the amendments suggested by the committee and amendments offered by individual Senators would be considered as the bill was being read. That course has not only always been adopted with tariff bills, but with all the great appropriation bills. It is eminently proper, it seems to me, that that course should be pursued in this case.

I do not understand that there is any rule which permits the Senator from Tennessee, or any other Senator, to demand that, as a matter of right, this bill shall be read at any particular time in the course of the discussion. Parlimentary rules prescribe that a bill shall be read on three different days, but this bill apparently has had two readings by title, and now it is proposed to read the bill through for the information of the Senate and for amendment.

I will suggest to my friend from Tennessee that that course be followed with this bill. It certainly will suit the convenience, it seems to me, of Senators on both sides of the Chamber, because, if the bill is read through now it will be open to amendment at every stage, and no particular progress will be made in the reading of the bill. We can offer amendments to the first paragraph now and discuss those amendments ad infinitum, if we please; and the Senator from Tennessee gains nothing in the discussion of the bill. The first paragraph may be read, and we can offer amendments and the discussion can proceed, if we please, upon those amendments as long as we choose to carry it on. It seems to me, however, the more orderly manner, which has been followed heretofore, would be, after general discussion was exhausted, for the bill to be read through by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. MANDERSON. Will the Senator allow me a suggestion?

Mr. HARRIS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANDERSON. Are we to understand by the reading of the bill that the Senator asks that the bill is to be read as it came from the House of Representatives, or as reported by the Committee on Finance?

Mr. HARRIS. The usual course on a bill, under the practice of the Senate, is to read the bill as it comes to the Senate, whether from the other House or from a Senator by direction of a committee; and when the bill has been read through, the Chair announces, according to rule and according to practice, that "the bill is in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment."

When the debate shall have practically closed I shall ask that the first committee amendment be reported, and when reported by the Secretary it is amendable. Any Senator on either side of the Chamber may move to amend the amendment reported by the committee, and may test the sense of the Senate upon an amendment to the committee amendment. Finally, when the amendments to the committee amendment have been agreed to or rejected, and that amendment has been agreed to or rejected, the Senate passes on to the next committee amendment. The same rule will be applied to that and to every other committee amendment; and when the committee amendments have been disposed of, the whole bill, except those amendments which have been disposed of in Committee of the Whole, will be open to amendment. When the bill is reported to the Senate, every amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, and every other feature of the bill, will be open to amendment in the Senate. So there is not the slightest shadow of possibility, by carrying out my suggestion and reading the bill now, of excluding any legitimate amendment any Senator desires to offer. Certainly I shall interpose no objection, nor will any Senator on this side, I take it for granted, interpose an objection to any amendment that is not out of order for some other reason than the fact that the bill has been read.

Mr. MANDERSON. Do I understand the Senator from Tennessee to propose to impose upon this bill an additional consumption of time, which is not usual with tariff bills heretofore considered, or with the general appropriation bills: that is, that the bill as it came to the Senate before its reference to the Committee on Finance shall be read at length, and then be read by paragraphs for amendments of the committee?

Mr. HARRIS. I made no such suggestion.

Mr. MANDERSON. Then I misunderstood the Senator, and I think he was generally misunderstood on this side.

Mr. HARRIS. I was answering the suggestions of the Senator from Rhode Island. I do not care to say more than this: Neither the Senator from Rhode Island, nor the Senator from Nebraska, nor any other Senator can name a time when any bill has been considered as in Committee of the Whole without first being read to the Committee of the Whole, unless the reading was dispensed with by unanimous consent. I asked that consent when the bill was first laid before the Senate, and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] objected. I then asked consent that the reading might be dispensed with until the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] could submit his remarks and that it might then be read, and that consent was given.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator whether the course has not been that the general debate has gone on until terminated either by agreement or the exhaustion of the Senate; and when the real contest upon the bill comes up, has it not then been customary for the Senator in charge of the measure to ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with in order that it may be considered for amendment, and then whatever arrangement is to be made for the conduct of debate during the consideration of the bill is done at that time? If the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion, if instead of projecting this question now he would wait until the general debate has terminated, and then make the proposition, I think he would find no difficulty in the same course being agreed upon that has been pursued on other tariff bills; and he and the Senate would, by reason of the reading of the bill being dispensed with, save the time which would be taken up by the reading. If the Senator is willing to withdraw that point at present and content himself with bringing it up, with all his rights, when the general debate is ended, everybody will be satisfied.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Maine will refer to his own experience (for he has long been a very prominent member of the Committee on Appropriations, and has often been in charge of very large and voluminous appropriation bills), he will find the RECORD shows that immediately upon his asking the consideration of the appropriation bill he and every other Senator similarly situated has asked unanimous consent that the formal reading be dispensed with, and that the committee amendments be acted upon as reached in the reading of the bill.

Mr. HALE. But there is a distinction between the two cases. In the first place, we have no system or practice of general debate upon appropriation bills. We plunge at once in medias res, and there is no such course pursued as upon a tariff bill. Besides, the Senator will find—and perhaps on the whole it would be better—that this matter should go over to-day in order that the precedents may be examined——

Mr. ALDRICH. I have them here and will have them read.

Mr. HALE. The Senator will find that the course is not the same upon tariff bills that it is upon appropriation bills. I do not mean to say the courses are so different that we should have any difficulty in coming together on an agreement, for I believe we should come to an agreement; but I think the Senator from Tennessee will find—the Senator from Rhode Island perhaps has the precedents here—that the course in relation to amendments is not precisely the same on tariff bills that it is on appropriation bills.

Mr. HOAR. With great deference to the Senators who have this matter more immediately in charge, it seems to me that there is one question to be considered, and only one; and that is the practical difference between an appropriation bill and a tariff bill.

I suppose there is no doubt whatever that the Senator from Tennessee has a right to have the bill read whenever he demands it, as it has not yet been read, and the right has been reserved. When it is read, does he expect that the committee amendments upon all parts of the bill are to be voted on first before an amendment offered by any Senator is considered at all? I understand that is the course on appropriation bills, and for obvious reasons the Senate always consents to it. If the Senator from Tennessee has an amendment to the first line of an appropriation bill of 100 pages, he waits until the one hundredth page has been amended by the committee, if they want to amend it. But in tariff legislation, as far as I remember (and I have been in this and the other House nearly twenty-six years), the course is the other way. It is not convenient to amend, for instance, the income-tax provision, or the metallic schedule, without knowing somewhat how much revenue the Senate expect to raise, or what principle they are going to apply in the early sections of the bill. We might strike out at the end of the bill a duty, or legislate in regard to it, so that it would result in a decrease of $10,000,000 of revenue.

It seems to me, therefore, that the true way is the course suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island, which is the usual way always, and that is, that everybody shall have his opportunity to move amendments in regard to one paragraph or schedule or portion of the bill before we proceed to another paragraph. I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that he had better let this matter go over. It is now 5 o'clock, and he had better, if he can, come to some agreement with the members of his committee on our side of the Chamber. None of us on this side of the Chamber want to let so important a matter be disposed of in two minutes or five minutes when we only half understand it; but of course I suppose the Senators on this side of the Chamber would expect to follow advice on this point in regard to which the committee is in substantial accord. I therefore suggest to the Senator that instead of insisting on a proceeding which we do not half understand and do not see the effect of at this moment, he let it go over until he can have some understanding with his associates on the committee.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator from Massachusetts just a week ago had entertained the same opinion that he seems to entertain now, the formal reading of the bill would have been dispensed with. It was his objection, and his objection only, that prevented it.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will pardon me, I understand that he wanted to do then what he is trying to have done now, without an agreement with those who have the special charge of our interests on this side of the Chamber; he wanted, as a two minutes' question, to have this whole matter disposed of.

I entertained then the same opinion I entertain now. I thought then that it was better to save the Senate a day's fatigue by having to listen to the reading of the bill, which would take several hours, and I objected to anything being done. I object now, but I expect, unless there is something which is objectionable to my own judgment, to follow the advice of the Senators on this side of the Chamber who have this matter specially in charge.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. I only yielded a moment to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. President, I know of no reason why the consideration of a tariff bill should be treated differently from the consideration of an appropriation or other bills. The reading of the bill is not going to change a punctuation mark or a word in it, and we will have accomplished that much.

In answer to one clause of the inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts, I will state that the usual custom is to go through with the committee amendments, each one of which is amendable, after which every word and every line in the bill is subject to amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will my friend from Tennessee allow me to say a word? I am assured, and it is in accord with my recollection for thirty-odd years, that in the consideration of tariff bills the bill has been taken up and read, not clear through, but whenever an amendment is offered by a Senator at any stage it is considered and voted upon. No preference whatever is given to amendments from the Committee on Finance. Nor would it be just and fair to have that done, because if preference were given to amendments by the Committee on Finance alone we would run through the whole bill, and then we would have to go back and go all through it again, in order to give other Senators a chance to offer amendments.

If the Senator from Tennessee will let the matter go over until to-morrow and look at the precedents he will find that in all the debates on tariff bills, and we have had several of them in a comparatively recent period, the usual course has been, if I am not mistaken, to take up the bill: the Secretary reads one item, and if there is no amendment offered he goes on to another, and so on until he comes to a committee amendment. Then the vote is taken on the amendment; and so he goes on through the whole bill. But a Senator has at any time a right to offer an amendment, especially an amendment to a committee amendment, and those are often the most important questions in dispute.

Mr. HARRIS. I will state to the Senator from Ohio that whatever conclusion may be arrived at as to the order of amendments does not affect the present question. That comes up subsequently. The usual and uniform practice has been, and Jefferson's Manual lays down the rule, that the committee amendments are first to be acted upon.

Mr. ALDRICH. Oh, no.

Mr. HARRIS. But I undertake to say to the Senator from Ohio, as I have said to other Senators, you can not find an instance where the formal reading of a bill has been dispensed with except by unanimous consent. It has usually been done on appropriation bills I grant, and it may have been done on tariff bills, in view of which fact I proposed a week ago that it be done in this case, but it was objected to. Now we are asked to sit here and debate and consider a bill no line or word of which has ever been read to the Senate except the title.

The uniform practice of the Senate has been to read the bill. It is not for time-comsuming that I ask for the reading of the bill; that is the vocation of my friend; I will not name him; he is in my eye, however. It is with a view of economizing time that I ask it, and I shall insist upon it.

Mr. ALDRICH. In order that the Senate may be advised as to what has been done in similar cases I ask that the RECORD may be read showing the proceedings on the act of 1890. I ask the Secretary to read the portion which I have marked.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Senator from Rhode Island, before that is read, allow me a moment?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. I should like to inquire, if I have a right to inquire, what his object is in objecting to the reading of the bill? He put a question of that kind a while ago to the Senator from Tennessee, and I should be obliged to him if he would state his object in objecting to the reading of the bill.

Mr. ALDRICH. My object is that the Senate shall follow the practice which it has followed invariably from the commencement of the Government, in my opinion. It certainly has followed the practice within my knowledge, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] says it has done so within his knowledge, which goes back to 1853; that is, to have the bill, when it is read, read by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Is that the proposition of the Senator from Rhode Island now?

Mr. ALDRICH. That is my proposition now.

Mr. BUTLER. To take up the bill and read it by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. That whenever it is taken up it shall be taken up and read by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand the Senator from Rhode Island to consent to the bill being taken up?

Mr. ALDRICH. It is up now, and my proposition is that it shall be proceeded with by paragraphs whenever the general debate is closed. I ask for the reading of what I send to the desk.

Mr. PASCO. I think there is a misapprehension as to the views of Senators on the different sides of the Chamber. I think that what the Senator from Tennessee asks is exactly what the Senator from Rhode Island is willing to concede, that there shall be no formal reading of the bill, but that the matter shall go over until the Senate is ready to take up the bill by paragraphs.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is my position exactly.

Mr. PASCO. I think that is exactly what the Senator from Rhode Island desires to accomplish and I understand that is what the Senators on this side are willing to concede. It seems to me that a waiver of the formal reading of the bill will accomplish all the results desired, and that there need be no further misunderstanding about the matter.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. If Senators will allow the debate on the tariff act of 1890 to be read, it seems to me it is so instructive that there will then be no question between the two sides of the Chamber.

Mr. GORMAN. Will the Senator from Rhode Island permit me for a moment?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. GORMAN. I think with the Senator from Florida, that there is a misapprehension on both sides. I understood the Senator from Tennessee to ask that the formal reading of the bill be waived——

Mr. MANDERSON. Oh, no; he asked for the reading of the bill.

Mr. GORMAN. And that when we come to consider it in detail and the reading begins, we shall pursue the same course we have always pursued in reference to tariff bills; that when the first item is read it is subject to amendment by any Senator.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is right.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator allow me to state that he misapprehends what I ask? I did ask a week ago that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with. It was objected to. I now ask that the bill be read.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask for the reading of the matter I have sent to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. GORMAN. I merely want to finish my sentence. I understand the Senators on the other side are now willing to make that arrangement.

Mr. ALDRICH. We are perfectly willing.

Mr. GORMAN. The very arrangement suggested by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. I prefer to have the bill read.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hope we will not prevent the Senator from Tennessee from filibustering against the passage of the bill if he wants to do it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Rhode Island. The Secretary will read as indicated.

The Secretary read from the proceedings of the Senate July 25, 1890, as follows:

THE REVENUE BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9416) to reduce the revenue and equalize duties on imports, and for other purposes.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. Before the Senator from North Carolina proceeds, I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be read by paragraphs for amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendments of the Committee on Finance to be considered first?

Mr. ALDRICH. The amendments of the committee to be considered first.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Does the Senator ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the committee's amendments be acted upon?

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the bill be read by paragraphs for amendment, the committee amendments to be considered first. That is the course which has been followed in the consideration of every tariff bill within my knowledge, and it is the course which is always followed in the consideration of appropriation bills.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I still do not understand the Senator. Do I understand his request to be that the bill be read by paragraphs for amendment before the committee amendments are considered?

Mr. ALDRICH. The bill to be read by paragraphs, and the committee amendments to be considered first, and then other amendments in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. After that?

Mr. ALDRICH. After that, of course. Every paragraph of the bill will be open to amendment both in Committee of the Whole and in the Senate.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Then it is the purpose of the Senator to have the bill read by paragraphs in order to amend the paragraphs as we go along?

Mr. ALDRICH. For the purpose of acting upon the committee amendments as we go along. That is the course which has always been followed with tariff bills and with appropriation bills invariably.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Then, I submit to the Senator, why is it necessary to proceed with the reading of the bill by paragraphs if the purpose be to take up the committee amendments and consider them first? The Senator will not fail to observe how difficult it will be for the Senate to understand this tariff bill by first considering the committee amendments. The action of the Senate and the judgment of the Senate upon the committee amendments should be and will be entirely dependent upon something which precedes. If we are not permitted to amend each paragraph as we go along, taking up the committee amendments in their order as they come, we certainly can make no very intelligent revision of the tariff.

Mr. ALDRICH. As nearly as I could state it, that was my object in making the request which I did, that the bill should be read by paragraphs, the committee amendments to be acted upon first, and then any other amendments which might be offered.

Mr. ALLISON. The whole bill will be open to amendment.

Mr. ALDRICH. The whole bill is open to amendment at every stage.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If it be the purpose, then, to consider the committee amendments first—if that be the determination—why not consider the committee amendments first, and omit the reading of the bill for information?

Mr. ALDRICH. That is exactly my proposition.

Mr. MCPHERSON. And then go back and take up the entire bill for amendment by paragraphs?

Mr. ALDRICH. That is exactly the proposition which I made.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Then I want to say that I do not understand how the Senate can make any intelligent revision of the tariff by considering a subject first which depends upon some other preceding subject. For instance, a very large increase is made here in the duty upon carpets. Carpets, as we know, are made from a cheap quality of wool. Now, the duty has been raised to an inordinate extent upon the raw wool. How can we intelligently act upon the carpet schedule until we know what the purpose of the Senate is touching the wool schedule?

Mr. ALDRICH. Wools will be acted upon first. The paragraphs relating to wools will certainly be read first, subject to amendment.

Mr. MCPHERSON. But the committee amendments do not touch it.

Mr. ALDRICH. Subject to amendment. The Senator from New Jersey or any other Senator can move any amendment he chooses to the paragraph with regard to the duties upon carpet wools. I am only suggesting what the Senator from New Jersey, so far as I can understand, desires and is anxious to have done.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If I understand the Senator his purpose is to take up the bill and first to consider the Senate Finance Committee amendments. He proposes to omit the formal reading of the bill until the committee amendments are considered.

Mr. ALDRICH. Not at all.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Then to begin the reading of the bill by paragraphs in the beginning.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCPHERSON. And all the paragraphs will be subject to amendment?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. And committee amendments will be reached in their order?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I am perfectly content, Mr. President.

Mr. PLUMB. There is one other inquiry that I should like to make, and that is whether after a paragraph has been amended it can be amended in the same particular again, or whether there would have to be a motion to reconsider the adoption of that amendment in case some member of the Senate should desire to move to amend what had already been amended?

Mr. ALDRICH. Undoubtedly; the rules of the Senate would apply to that. If an amendment to a paragraph had been agreed to the same thing could not be changed except by a reconsideration in Committee of the Whole. It would be open to amendment in the Senate.

Mr. HISCOCK. It will be open to amendment.

Mr. PLUMB. Open to amendment in the Senate?

Mr. HISCOCK. Certainly.

Mr. PLUMB. The whole of it?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Under the rules of the Senate, after two days have passed, when an amendment has been agreed to, to wit, if you please, a committee's amendment, it will not be in order even to move a reconsideration.

Mr. SPOONER. You do not have to move a reconsideration.

Mr. MCPHERSON. If, then, general consent be given that all the amendments will be subject again to amendment as they are reached in proper order, I have no objection.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is the understanding, I think, fully.

Mr. VANCE. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator will excuse me a moment, I should be glad to understand, for my own convenience respecting this bill, whether or not we have reached the point suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island, which I understand to be that the formal reading of the bill shall be dispensed with, and that it shall be read by paragraphs for amendment, the committee amendments being first considered.

Mr. SHERMAN. All through?

Mr. ALLISON. All the committee amendments. That is the usual course, and I think it might as well be understood now as at any time.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Why not let the committee amendments be reached in their order and considered then?

Mr. ALLISON. That is what I propose.

Mr. HARRIS. That is it exactly.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is exactly the proposition which I have made, as clearly and as plainly as I could state it, that the paragraphs be read seriatim, and that when a committee amendment was reached it should be acted upon first, and if any other amendment were proposed, of course that would have to be acted upon.

Mr. PADDOCK. We can not hear the Senator over here.

Mr. ALDRICH. The amendments of the Finance Committee are open to amendment themselves, and then the paragraphs are open to amendment without any limit whatever. It is not the intention of the committee to limit amendments in any form, but merely to follow the course which has been invariably followed in the consideration of bills of this nature.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Then, Mr. President——

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from New Jersey allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. MCPHERSON. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. Under the rules the bill would have to be read, every line of it, before any action is taken upon any amendment. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with; that the bill be read from the first line down to the first committee amendment, and that that amendment be acted upon when reached, and so on through the entire reading of the bill——

Mr. MANDERSON. There seems to be a great deal of this matter. Had we not better have it printed in the RECORD of to-morrow morning so that we can all read it at our convenience? And, if the Senator from Tennessee will yield to me, I will move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope that we shall dispose of this matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Nebraska, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. QUAY and Mr. VEST called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GIBSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. GRAY (when his name was called). I withhold my vote for the present, as I am paired with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], unless my vote becomes necessary to make a quorum, when I shall cast it.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. I should vote "nay" if he were here. I do not know how he would vote.

Mr. HUNTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. If he were here I should vote "nay."

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS. I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska that we transfer our pairs and both vote.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am perfectly willing to do so. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] will then stand paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. I vote "yea."

Mr. HARRIS. I vote "nay."

Mr. QUAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BUTLER (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. I am paired with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS]. I should vote "yea" if he were present. I will state further that I was requested by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. MCMILLAN] to announce that he stands paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE].

Mr. GORDON (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON]. He is not present, and I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. CHANDLER (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY], and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. COCKRELL (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], and presuming that he might vote "yea" if present I will withdraw my vote. I should vote "nay" if he were here.

The result was announced—yeas 13, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—13.

Aldrich,	Hawley,	Pettigrew,	Washburn.
Carey,	Higgins,	Power,

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the Secretary proceed with the reading of the extract from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reading will be continued.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the Senator from Rhode Island yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ALDRICH. I can not yield now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The reading will proceed.

The Secretary read as follows:

Now, when the committee amendments have been acted upon and the bill read from beginning to end, and all of them acted upon as the Senate may choose to act upon them, by agreeing to them, disagreeing, or amending them, then the bill will still be in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment, and the right of every Senator recognized to go back to the first line of the bill and offer amendments to every part of it.

Mr. DAWES. That is the ordinary way, but I understood the Senator from Rhode Island to suggest a modification of that way.

Mr. HARRIS. I did not so understand the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the committee amendments may be acted upon first.

Mr. DAWES. And go through the bill with the committee amendments?

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes.

Mr. HISCOCK. Go through the bill acting upon the committee amendments. Then the bill is perfected that far, and then that becomes the groundwork for amendment by the Senate.

Mr. PLUMB. In acting upon appropriation bills that has been the usual course, but it was not the course pursued in regard to the last tariff bill, as Senators will well remember. Amendments were offered, long before the close of the bill was reached, to the intervening paragraphs. Whatever may be done about appropriation bills is done by common consent, which exists at the time, which any member of the Senate may refuse to agree to.

I object now to binding the Senate to a course of proceeding which it may find hurtful to the public interests and its own proceeding, for the Senate will undoubtedly accommodate itself to whatever is the best way of doing business as it goes along. I have no objection to reading the bill in the manner stated, and it will undoubtedly happen that as a paragraph is reached the amendments of the committee will be first disposed of and the discussion will ensue with relation to them; but that we should drop that paragraph so far as amendments individually are concerned, and go on to the next, and then on clear through the bill, creating a necessity to go back in an irregular way through the bill again for the purpose of individual amendment, seems to me to be against the proper way of doing things and liable to make a great deal of confusion.

I object to so much of the request as relates to the consideration of amendments. That can be determined after we arrive at them from time to time.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be read by paragraphs. Of course then it will be open to amendment, the committee amendments coming before all others.

Mr. PLUMB. That is right.

Mr. HISCOCK. I understand the Senator from Kansas objects that the committee amendments should be acted upon first.

Mr. PLUMB. As to a particular paragraph?

Mr. HISCOCK. Yes.

Mr. PLUMB. Not at all.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does he consent that the committee amendments shall be acted upon first in respect to each paragraph, and then other amendments to follow?

Mr. PLUMB. That will be subject to this qualification: There might be an amendment which some one would desire to propose to take the place of the entire paragraph.

Mr. HISCOCK. But the suggestion I make is that the paragraph should be perfected, if the Senate choose to perfect it, by the adoption of the committee amendment, and that should be the basis of further amendment then and there to be offered by Senators.

Mr. PLUMB. This matter will adjust itself according to the convenience of Senators as we go along; and I think the fewer hide-bound rules we have in the beginning the better we shall be off. I shall object to that, because there may be cases in which it would not be the easiest way to proceed and it might get us into parliamentary embarrassment.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to have the request I made submitted to the Senate to see if there are other objections. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that it be read for consideration by paragraphs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HARRIS. Let me understand exactly what the Senator means by being "read for consideration by paragraphs." Does he desire that each paragraph shall be open to amendment, or that the committee amendments shall first be acted upon?

Mr. ALDRICH. I desire that the committee amendments should first be acted on. My present request is that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read by paragraphs for consideration. Of course, in the presence of objection, I know of no way by which the committee amendments can be necessarily acted upon first or by which we can go on in the usual course.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to either method, but I desire to understand exactly what method the Senator proposes to adopt.

Mr. ALDRICH. I preferred the method suggested by the Senator from Tennessee himself, but the Senator from Kansas objected to that.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no objection to the other.

Mr. ALDRICH. I now ask simply that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be read by paragraphs for consideration.

Mr. MCPHERSON. And when read by paragraphs for consideration the Senator means by that the paragraphs will be open to amendment as they are reached?

Mr. ALDRICH. Certainly; under the rules of the Senate they are open to amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Rhode Island? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ALDRICH. Those are the precedents which were established in 1890. I now ask to have the debate on the act of 1883 read to show——

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Rhode Island allow me to call his attention to the fact that he himself recognized the exact rule I have insisted upon here, according to that record? He stood here for one hour asking the unanimous consent of the Senate and reasoning to get that unanimous consent to dispense with the formal reading of the bill so that the bill could be read for amendment. Does the Senator want to go further in consuming the time of the Senate in reading the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD?

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator from Tennessee, and the Senators he represents, will accept the rule which was adopted in 1890, I shall have nothing more to say upon the subject.

Mr. HALE. That is fair.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Rhode Island is insisting now upon controlling the methods of considering this bill. I prefer that the bill shall be read. That will not limit general debate; it will not change a line of the bill, and there is not one word or line in it which will not be open to amendment afterwards.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Rhode Island is not attempting to control the action of the Senate upon this question.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I should like to know what he is attempting to do?

Mr. ALDRICH. I am calling the attention of the Senate to the precedents which have been adopted and to the rule which has been laid down in the discussion of every tariff bill for the last thirty years.

Mr. HARRIS. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. ALDRICH. Only by unanimous consent, the Senator from Tennessee says. The RECORD shows that there was no Senator on either side of this Chamber who at that time did not concede the fairness of the rule. It was done by unanimous consent every time, and I am only surprised that the Senator from Tennessee should not agree to follow the rule which he assisted in making in 1890, and that this debate should go on forever upon a question, if I understand the Senator from Tennessee, which is of no consequence at all; but if he has any meaning behind it it is of the utmost consequence to the discussion of this question, and we shall stay here until it is decided properly.

Mr. HARRIS. Very well.

Mr. PALMER. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. I have not yielded the floor. I am asking to have a paper read.

Mr. PALMER. Ordinarily——

Mr. ALDRICH. I will yield to a question, or if the Senator desires to make a motion I will yield.

Mr. PALMER. I do not ask the Senator to yield for a question.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Illinois seems to be under a misapprehension. I had the floor.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair had recognized the Senator from Rhode Island. The Senator from Rhode Island asks that a certain portion of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD be read.

Mr. PALMER. I object to the reading of the RECORD.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then I shall read it myself.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Rhode Island yield to me for a formal motion?

Mr. ALDRICH. I will.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business; and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GEORGE (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH]. If he were present, I should vote "nay." I am at liberty, however, to vote if my vote be necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. HUNTON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], and shall not vote unless my vote be necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. IRBY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CAREY].

Mr. MCLAURIN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. DIXON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). Upon this question I am paired with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator transfer his pair? I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS. That will leave the Senator from Vermont paired with the Senator from North Dakota, and I will record my vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PERKINS. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to inquire if the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee has voted, the Chair understands.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Tennessee. I understood the Senator to announce that he was paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], and that he had transferred that pair to a Senator who voted the same way he did.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not know how the Senator would vote.

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator should find out how the other Senator would vote before he transfers his pair.

Mr. HARRIS. I always desire to do so. Can the Senator from Massachusetts tell me how the Senator from Vermont would vote?

Mr. HOAR. I have no doubt he would vote "yea." He has gone home, and I think, therefore, he would like the Senate to go home.

Mr. HARRIS. Does the Senator from Massachusetts know that the Senator from Vermont would vote "yea" if here?

Mr. HOAR. I have no doubt whatever of it. The Senator from Tennessee, when announcing that he was paired with that Senator and transferring the pair, ought undoubtedly to know how the Senator would vote.

Mr. HARRIS. I do not know. I announced my pair because I did not know how the Senator would vote; but when I took the liberty of transferring the pair I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that I was very much surprised to find that he would agree with me in anything. I shall, however, have no question about the propriety of my pair, and withdraw my vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee withdraws his vote.

Mr. PERKINS. I withdraw my vote, and stand paired with the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. RANSOM (after having voted in the negative). I voted inadvertently. I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and withdraw my vote.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to know whether the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Then I withdraw my vote, because I am paired with that Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. BUTLER. I announce my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay," and he, I suppose, would vote "yea."

Mr. CAFFERY. I am paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. POWER], and withhold my vote.

Mr. CALL (after having voted in the negative). I desire to know if the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted.

Mr. CALL. I am paired with that Senator, and therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. GORDON (after having voted in the negative). I voted inadvertently. I withdraw my vote, as I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. GIBSON. I desire to again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], who has been called away from the Senate for a few days. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. HILL. I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. GORDON. If a quorum has not voted, I reserved the right with my pair to vote to make a quorum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No quorum has voted.

Mr. GORDON. Then I vote "nay."

Mr. GEORGE. The Senate being without a quorum, I have a right under the terms of my pair to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. MCLAURIN. Under the agreement with the Senator with whom I am paired, I have the right to vote to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

Mr. HUNTON. I understand that no quorum has voted, and for the purpose of making a quorum I vote "nay."

Mr. CALL. I do not know whether I have the right to vote or not. As announced, I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. I will leave the question to the Senators on the other side. If any of them object to my voting to make a quorum, I shall not feel at liberty to vote.

Mr. QUAY. It seems to me, Mr. President, if the Senator from Florida has no reservation as to his right to vote in the absence of a quorum, he ought not to vote.

Mr. ALDRICH. I insist upon the point of order I made some time ago, that during the roll call debate is not in order.

Mr. HARRIS. Let the result be announced. No debate is in order now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair is not entertaining debate. The Senator from Florida will have to determine for himself as to whether or not he will vote.

Mr. CALL. I do not feel at liberty to vote without some further understanding with the Senator from Vermont.

The result was announced—yeas 2, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—2.

Mitchell, Oregon	Squire.

NAYS—31.

Allen,	Faulkner,	McLaurin,	Pugh.

Daniel,	Lindsay,	Peffer,

NOT VOTING—52.

Aldrich,	Dolph,	Irby,	Quay,
Allison,	Dubois,	Jones, Nev.	Ransom,
Blackburn,	Frye,	Lodge,	Roach.
Butler,	Gallinger,	McMillan,	Sherman,

Carey,	Hansbrough,	Murphy,	Teller,
Chandler,	Harris,	Perkins,	Vance,
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Pettigrew,	Washburn,
Cullom,	Higgins,	Platt,	White,
Davis,	Hill,	Power,	Wilson,
Dixon,	Hoar,	Proctor,	Wolcott.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No quorum has voted.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. ALDRICH. Does the Chair refuse to entertain the motion of the Senator from Tennessee?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. What is the motion to which the Senator refers?

Mr. HARRIS. The Chair having announced that no quorum had voted, I moved that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators; but perhaps under the rule a call of the Senate should first be had.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair ordered the roll call, which, under the rule of the Senate, is imperative, as the Chair understands, when the absence of a quorum is shown.

Mr. HARRIS. The Chair is correct.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Coke,	Kyle,	Pettigrew,
Allen,	Daniel,	Lindsay,	Pugh,
Bate,	Gallinger,	McLaurin,	Quay,
Berry,	George,	McPherson,	Ransom,
Blackburn,	Gibson,	Martin,	Squire,
Blanchard,	Gordon,	Mitchell, Oregon	Stewart,
Brice,	Gorman,	Mitchell, Wis.	Turpie,
Butler,	Gray,	Morgan,	Vest,
Call,	Harris,	Murphy,	Vilas,
Camden,	Higgins,	Palmer,	Voorhees,
Carey,	Hunton,	Pasco,	Walsh.
Chandler,	Irby,	Peffer,
Cockrell,	Jones, Ark.	Perkins,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. HARRIS. The last roll call shows that there is a voting quorum present. There is no doubt a quorum present, and the question therefore recurs on the motion made by the Senator from Maine. I will withdraw my motion, to see if we have a voting quorum upon the question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question recurs upon the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. ALDRICH. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, which I desire to make now. I have noticed the habit of the Senator from Tennessee——

Mr. HARRIS. The question is not debatable.

Mr. ALDRICH. At odd intervals when the rules of the Senate provide that no debate shall be had, of getting up and addressing the Senate, giving notice of what he intends to do and what he does not intend to have somebody else do in the future. I desire that hereafter the rules of the Senate be enforced.

Mr. HARRIS. I will undertake to enforce them now. I rise to a question of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the pending motion is not debatable. The Senator from Rhode Island stated to the Chair that he rose to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. ALDRICH. I did, and that was that debate was not in order.

Mr. HARRIS. The question is not debatable. No debate is in order on a motion to go into executive session.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. ALDRICH. The question I desire to put to the Presiding Officer——

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator from Rhode Island is out of order. I call for order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will hear a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HARRIS. Then it must be a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator from Tennessee is out of order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Rhode Island has a parliamentary inquiry to propound to the Chair, the Chair will hear it; but the Chair will not hear debate.

Mr. ALDRICH. The Senator from Rhode Island desired to know whether the remarks made by the Senator from Tennessee pending the roll call upon the pending question were in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on the motion of the Senator from Maine.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. COCKRELL (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], and therefore can not vote. I should vote "nay" if at liberty to do so.

Mr. GALLINGER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. GIBSON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE], and therefore withhold my vote. If I were not paired I should vote "nay."

Mr. GORDON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. GORMAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE].

Mr. GRAY (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], but I had an understanding with him that where my vote is necessary to make a quorum I may vote, and I therefore vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. HILL (when his name was called). I will state, once for all, as I do not care to repeat it again, that I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. HUNTON (when his name was called). I shall vote on this question, notwithstanding my pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], the understanding being that either one of us is at liberty to vote to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH].

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I should vote "nay" if he were here.

Mr. BLACKBURN (after having voted in the negative). I withdraw my vote, as the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], with whom I am paired, is not present.

The result was announced—yeas 2, nays 32, not voting 51; as follows:

YEAS—2.

Mitchell, Oregon Squire.

NAYS—32.

Allen,	Daniel,	McLaurin,	Peffer,
Bate,	George,	McPherson,	Pugh,
Berry,	Gray,	Martin,	Stewart,

Dolph,	Hill,	Quay,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. A quorum has not voted.

Mr. QUAY (at 5 o'clock and 58 minutes p. m.). I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I suggest that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] is not here to make a motion.

Mr. QUAY. The Senator from Pennsylvania, I presume, has the privilege of appearing after the roll call.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania that the Senate do now adjourn. [Putting the question.] The "noes" have it, and the motion is not agreed to.

Mr. QUAY. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The Chair has announced his decision.

Mr. VEST and others. Too late.

Mr. QUAY. I do not think it is too late to call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that debate is not in order. The last roll call disclosed the lack of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll for the purpose of ascertaining whether a qurom be present.

Mr. QUAY. Do I understand that the Chair refuses to entertain my motion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair did not refuse to entertain the motion, but, under the rule, the Chair had made the announcement before the yeas and nays were called for. The Chair is simply enforcing the rules of the Senate.

Mr. BLACKBURN and others. That is right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Coke,	Jones, Ark.	Perkins,
Allen,	Daniel,	Kyle,	Pettigrew,
Bate,	Gallinger,	Lindsay,	Pugh,

Chandler,	Hunton,	Pasco,
Cockrell,	Irby,	Peffer,

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have responded to their names. A quorum is present. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business; upon which motion the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLACKBURN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If he were here I should vote "nay."

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

Mr. CAFFERY (when his name was called). I am paired generally with the Senator from Montana [Mr. POWER], with the understanding, however, that whenever his or my vote may make a quorum, or may tend to it, either may vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. If he were present I should vote "nay."

Mr. GIBSON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE]. If he were present I should "nay."

Mr. GORDON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON].

Mr. PERKINS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. ROACH].

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. GALLINGER. I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

Mr. GORDON. I inquire if a quorum has voted?

Mr. ALDRICH. I object. Debate is not in order.

Mr. GORDON. I have decided to vote to make a quorum. I vote "nay."

Mr. COCKRELL. I am paired with the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. If he were present I should vote "nay." I do not know how he would vote.

The result was announced—yeas 3, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—3.

Mr. QUAY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania, that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. QUAY. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BLACKBURN (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON], who is absent, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS. I know it is not in order at this stage of the proceeding to enter upon anything in the form of debate, but I trust I may be allowed to make a statement a minute or a minute and a half long.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Tennessee will proceed.

Mr. HARRIS. Under Rule V, when the Senate votes upon a question and less than a quorum votes, it is the duty of the Chair to order a call of the Senate. Upon that call if there appears to be less than a quorum, then it is in order to move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators. But if upon the call of the Senate a quorum is present, then, under Rule V, it is not in order to make that motion. Now, we find ourselves in a condition at this hour of the evening where there is not a quorum voting upon any question on which the Senate divides, but upon a call of the Senate there are seven Senators more than a quorum. Therefore we can not send for absent Senators, because a quorum is present.

In view of that condition of affairs I intend to-morrow morning to notify my pair that I can stand paired no longer, unless it is with the distinct understanding that I have a right to vote whenever I apprehend there is a want of a quorum. I think the only thing left for us to do is to give notice that our pairs exist no longer, so that we who are here and stay here shall all be free to vote.

After making that statement as to the present condition of affairs (and I hope before to-morrow night there will be a very different condition of affairs), I move that the Senate do now adjourn, as I do not wish to vibrate between the call of the roll upon the pending question and then a call of the Senate which develops the presence of a quorum.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 10, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

CONFIRMATION.

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate April 7, 1894.

AUDITOR OF THE TREASURY FOR POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

George A. Howard, of Tennessee, to be Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 9, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday was read and approved.

PAY OF ASSISTANT ATTORNEYS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Attorney-General submitting an estimate of deficiency in the appropriation for pay of special assistant attorneys, 1894; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES DEAL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Customs submitting the claim of Charles Deal, late deputy collector, and recommending an appropriation therefor; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. STRAUS, until next Tuesday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. COOPER of Florida, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. CANNON of Illinois, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. GOLDZIER, for eight days, on account of public business.

To Mr. CORNISH, for one week, on account of sickness in family.

To Mr. ENGLISH of New Jersey, for one week, on account of ill health.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees for reports.

The committees were called, but no reports were submitted.

REPRINT OF THE RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

On motion of Mr. CATCHINGS, a reprint of House bill 6518, making appropriation for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, was ordered, the supply being exhausted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order. This is District day under the rules, and I understand the regular order to be the consideration of business reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is in some doubt as to whether the regular order is not the proceedings that we had on Saturday. There is a motion pending.

Mr. HEARD. Well, if the Chair holds that that is the regular order, of course it will have to be disposed of first, but my impression was that that being a contest as to whether or not we should have a quorum as to the business of that day, it died with the proceedings of the day.

The SPEAKER. There was a motion made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to discharge an order previously made for the arrest of absent members.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit that that is not necessarily the regular order. I understand the rule to be that a motion may be withdrawn at any time prior to a decision upon it.

The SPEAKER. There has been no suggestion to withdraw this motion.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I was merely using that statement as a predicate for what I was about to say. If it be true that the mover of that motion could withdraw it at this stage—and I think it is quite clear that he could do so—it would seem to follow that it is not such a matter of privilege as the House must necessarily pass upon unless it is withdrawn. In other words, it may be such a proceeding that the gentleman who made the motion could insist upon the House acting upon it by calling it up, but if he chooses to withdraw it, or not to call it up, then I submit that it does not stand as a question of privilege which necessarily presents itself to the House for action at this time.

Mr. BURROWS. The gentleman from Illinois is not present to withdraw his motion, even if the suggestion of the gentleman from Mississippi is one that he would acquiesce in; and I suggest to the gentleman from Mississippi and to the Chair that if there be no objection this matter might go over for the present, and the House proceed with the District business.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the matter may go over without any decision of the question.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

METROPOLITAN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. HEARD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Missouri indicate the bill which he desires to call up?

Mr. HEARD. I desire to call up the unfinished business.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The bill that is pending.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill (H. R. 6171) to authorize the Metropolitan Railroad Company to change its motive power for the propulsion of the cars of said company.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It will be found on examination that the amendment pending on last District day was one offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], to insert the word "electric" after the word "underground" in the first section of the bill, line 11.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, is this bill in the House or in committee?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This bill was being considered in the House by unanimous consent, under agreement that the debate should be limited to five minutes on each amendment. The amendment that I have indicated was pending when the House adjourned.

The SPEAKER. The arrangement to which the gentleman refers was by unanimous consent.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It was. The debate had progressed for fifteen or twenty minutes under that agreement when the House adjourned.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY). The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Between the word "underground" and the word "system," in section 1, page 1, line 11, insert "electric."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on this amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to hear an explanation from some gentleman of the committee as to their reason for opposing the insertion of this word "electric." They have told us in their report and the arguments they have made that of the two permissible methods of propulsion—the underground trolley and the cable system—the cable system could in no event be used, leaving only the other. Now, in view of those statements what is the objection to this amendment?

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, as I stated when this bill was up for consideration on the last District day, the only object of the committee in recommending striking out the word "electric" was that while the committee believed, and continue to believe, that the underground system of propulsion as contemplated to be used is feasible, yet by striking out this word the company would be enabled, without coming to Congress for further authority, to use the cable on the Ninth street line if the other system should be demonstrated to be a failure.

The gentleman from Iowa has repeated a statement which was made on the last District day, that this company has insisted it is not practicable to use the cable system on this line. On that point I wish to say the gentleman is in error. The contention is, and always has been, that by reason of the great number of curves in the main line running from Georgetown to the Capitol it is impracticable to use the cable; but it is considered by the engineers feasible to use the cable on the Ninth street line.

But allow me to add that the committee is not here to-day resisting the insertion of the word "electric." On the contrary, I state to the House that there is not a single member of the committee who objects to an amendment which will limit this company to the use of underground electric propulsion. There is no opposition on the part of the committee to this amendment, and I hope it will be adopted unanimously.

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Speaker, I decidedly approve of inserting the word "electric" after the word "underground" in this bill, for the reason——

A MEMBER. We all agree to the amendment.

Mr. COOMBS. Very well; if there is no opposition to the amendment, I waive further remarks.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, strike out the seven last words of line 5, all of line 6, and three words of line 7 and insert——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The section to which this amendment applies has not been reached, as it was agreed that the bill should be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to amend by striking out the last word. I make this amendment for the purpose of giving notice of a motion which I desire to make and shall make at the proper time to recommit the bill with instructions to report a measure resuming all the rights that the Government conferred upon this company and providing some method for the use of the franchise.

I do this (and I may refer to the matter now, as it is a month since the subject was under discussion) because I believe this company has shown absolute and wanton contempt of the legislation of Congress. It has been the effort of Congress for five years to compel this company to furnish the people of this District adequate street-car facilities. Under various pretenses the company has refused to do this; and it now comes here asking for a further extension of time within which, as it says, it expects to comply with the mandates which were put upon it five years ago and which it ought to have obeyed four years ago. It has refused to pay a debt due to the District, not a debt, as has been said, of $147,000, but a debt of $234,000—a debt that has been adjudicated and determined to be due—a debt which, in my humble judgment, any man who investigates the question must decide that this company owes to the District.

You will remember that during the progress of the debate four weeks ago on this subject a gentleman during that discussion claimed that there was not the shadow of even an equitable claim against this company.

A MEMBER. Who was it?

Mr. HEPBURN (continuing). And yet here is the unquestioned fact of the existence of a statute that declares that they shall do certain work, which they have utterly refused to do, or at least omitted to do, that was done by the city and that they up to this time under various pretexts have repudiated.

These gentlemen told us the other day that these improvements made were made in streets mainly before the roadbed was laid. That is true. But when they were laid the company was then in default. This incorporating act was passed in 1864. The company was required to build the various street railways within a year. They secured an extension of the time, and when that expired they secured another extension, aggregating in all nearly five years, bringing the time when they should have furnished these facilities to the year 1869. These improvements were not made by the District until 1870, 1871, 1872, and 1873—years afterwards. There was during all of this time an obligation on the company to give the facilities and build the road which had not been complied with.

Now, they set up the fact of their own default as a reason why they should not be required to participate in the expense of the paving of these streets, notwithstanding that at their request their stringers and ties were laid in the pavement as it was being laid.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, I have but a short part of five minutes remaining, but will be glad to hear the gentleman.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I suppose the gentleman from Iowa would hardly take the position that a duty was on this company to do the work (after Congress had extended the time) within the time for which the extension had been allowed; and, second, the gentleman is utterly mistaken in the assertion that it was wholly done at the expense of the company. It was a suggestion that came primarily from the board of public works, and when the improvement was made, on streets not occupied by the company, it was done under a solemn contract between the company and the board of public works that they were not to do it

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. DOCKERY). The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I ask that the time of the gentleman from Iowa be extended for ten minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I am forced to object.

Mr. TAYLOR of Indiana. You will not save any time by it.

Mr. HEARD. I am perfectly willing to yield to the gentleman an additional five minutes; but in response to the gentleman from Indiana let me say we do not propose to make anything by objecting. We desire if possible to keep this debate strictly within the rule that we have agreed upon. I am perfectly willing that the gentleman from Iowa may have an additional five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama requested that he be allowed ten minutes' additional time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman from Iowa ask an extension of ten minutes?

Mr. HEPBURN. I should like to have that time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I hope there will be no objection to that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman from Missouri to object.

Mr. HEARD. I did object, but did not know the gentleman had made application for the extention or desired it, in fact. I have no objection to that if he wishes it.

But I hope I may be permitted to suggest to the House, in the consideration of this question, that I shall feel compelled to object hereafter to any extension beyond the time allowed by the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, four weeks ago when the discussion of this question was had three gentlemen of the committee occupied nearly all of the day in presenting the railroad side of the question. In view of that fact, I think it only fair that we may have an opportunity to give the other side of it.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will allow this correction. I, as chairman of the committee, occupied less than ten minutes that day, but the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], when I was about to move that the House proceed under the five-minute rule, indicated that he wanted more time, and he was permitted to proceed for an hour if he wanted to. He had no limit, and he certainly can not complain.

Mr. HEPBURN. Well, I am not complaining now.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not want to take issue with my friend, but I do not think he ought to say that the gentleman who spoke on that day presented the railroad side of the case. I tried in the time that I occupied to present both sides of the case.

Mr. HEPBURN. I did not observe the latter part of the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman admitted that he was not in the Hall, paying attention to what I said, because I had to correct him on that day.

Mr. HEPBURN. Very well; we shall not quarrel about that if we can get the case presented now. The gentleman from Tennessee in a sense is correct, in the correction that he made. In another he is not. This road came to Congress in 1864 and asked for these franchises. They were granted. They were exclusive. For more than eight years a portion of them were held in this way, they refusing to go on with the improvements, refusing to give the facilities for travel, and prohibiting anybody else from getting in. Again the gentleman is partially correct. It is true that the Commissioners, for fear that there might be some pretense on the part of the company that they were not consulted, notified them, and then they made the request that they be permitted, or that the authorities of the District should lay the stringers and the cross-ties in the pavement as it was being constructed.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Right there, if the gentleman will permit me, that was done under a solemn contract between the road and the board of public works, that no part of the work then done should be at the expense of the road.

Mr. HEPBURN. There was no contract at that time at all, if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. But the record shows it.

Mr. HEPBURN. The president of the road, in one of the letters, put in that proposition. There was never any acceptance of that at all. There was no waiver, and there never has been a waiver, on the part of the authorities of the District, of the duty of the company to put in this pavement, and there could be none.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. But the letters to which the gentleman refers constitute the contract.

Mr. HEPBURN. They do not.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. In law they do.

Mr. HEPBURN. They do not. There is no agreement of that kind.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. And that agreement was that the road should proceed, provided it should not be held responsible for any of the paving.

Mr. HEPBURN. And the court has passed upon that matter, and has refused to recognize that. They could not have done it if they had wanted to. Here was an act of Congress requiring them to pave their tracks, imposing upon the railroad company that duty, but that is a part and parcel of all the other special pleadings that we have heard here in behalf of this railway company. There is no foundation in fact for it, nor is there in law, nor is there in justice. They are here simply pleading now the effect of their default for all these years.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in my judgment they ought not to be permitted to have this benefit for themselves. Other railway companies have responded to the obligation of the law, and they have made payment. I can not exactly tell you the amount of the payments they have made, but one corporation, the Washington and Georgetown Railroad, has paid $60,000. Others have paid sums aggregating in all, with the interest, perhaps, $100,000. These other companies stand in precisely the same attitude toward the taxpayers of this District as does the Metropolitan road. Now, if you wipe out this indebtedness, if you say it shall not pay, why in justice and in equity are you not required to make restitution to the companies that have paid? If this thing is done, it will be but a little while——

Mr. KYLE. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Mr. KYLE. Is it not a fact that the Commissioners of the District, and the District attorney, and everybody connected with the government of this city and its affairs, is protesting against the passage of this bill?

Mr. HEPBURN. The gentleman is correct. They are all protesting against it. It is the District Committee against the whole people of the District. That is the issue.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman ought not to make as broad a statement as that. That is not the case.

Mr. HEPBURN. Who else is on your side of the contention?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I want to state that what the gentleman has said is not the case at all. I do not wish to occupy his time now.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will be very glad to be corrected if I am wrong.

Mr. KYLE. Has not the gentleman a copy of a letter from the attorney of the District here protesting against it?

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman has said the amount involved is $234,000, instead of $147,000. I should like an explanation of that.

Mr. HEPBURN. The original debt at the time judgment was rendered was $147,000, with ten or eleven years' interest. The interest amounts to more than $80,000.

It is true that in the efforts toward compromise, I believe, nothing was said about that interest; and yet it is as much due to the District and to the Government as anything else.

Mr. KILGORE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. HEPBURN. If I can answer it I will.

Mr. KILGORE. I understand that there is a proposition in this bill to extend the time fixed for requiring this road to change its motive power?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KILGORE. From mule to some other power?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes.

Mr. KILGORE. And coupled with that is a proposition to pay a debt it owes to the city?

Mr. HEPBURN. There is nothing of that kind in this bill.

Mr. KILGORE. And you contend that there ought to be?

Mr. HEPBURN. There ought to be a proposition of that kind in it. Heretofore there has been legislation of that kind.

Mr. KILGORE. Is there question in the courts bearing on that question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Not now; that has all been adjudicated. It was lost to the District, because of the plea of the statute of limitation. Now, there was a time, Mr. Chairman (and allow me to explain that), when the authorities of the District did not believe the three years' statute of limitation applied to the District; that there was some element of sovereignty in the District as the representative of the Federal Government that prevented the operation of the bar of the statute. They went on under that theory until the three years elapsed.

Again, there is a reason for the failure to bring suits at the proper time. There was an attempt being made by the city authorities and the railroad corporation to secure an amicable adjudication and to secure an agreed statement of facts. One of the attorneys for the Government says that the facts were agreed upon; and there was a belief that there would be no difficulty about securing an authoritative agreement in writing; but after a time the authorities on the part of this railroad company refused to make that agreement, waiving the bar of the statutes. Gentlemen tell us that there has been no litigation on the matter. My understanding is that every question has been properly investigated and that upon every question except that of the statute of limitation the city authorities have recovered in the actions that have been brought.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. And was not the case taken to the Supreme Court, and upon one of the propositions was not the decision of the court below reversed by the Supreme Court?

Mr. HEPBURN. The Supreme Court reversed on the point of the statute of limitation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. And if the court below made an error in one proposition, is it not possible that they made errors with reference to other parts of the question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Of course, I take it for granted that all courts may possibly commit errors.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Without taking the time of the gentleman, I simply desire to enter a denial.

Mr. HEPBURN. A denial of what?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. That there has been an adjudication agreed upon by the courts.

Mr. HEPBURN. Do you say that there was no adjudication?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. There was no adjudication.

Mr. HEPBURN. Did not the court below pass upon every one of the twelve questions presented to them?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Yes, it was passed upon by the court withdrawing the main question from the jury and preventing substantially any adjudication upon it.

Mr. HEPBURN. The court adjudicated it. It was one of the questions that the court could withdraw from the jury, but there was no reversal of that action.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. That is where we differ.

Mr. HEPBURN. There has been no conflict in the evidence between these parties until within these latter days. When they were attempting to agree upon a statement of the facts there was no controversy about the facts. The refusal upon the part of the railroad company was based upon the waiver of the plea of the statute of limitation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Chairman, in consideration of the interruptions, I ask that the gentleman be allowed ten minutes more.

Mr. HEARD. I hope that the gentleman will not press that motion until the Committee may have an opportunity to be heard. The House knows that the gentleman has been treated liberally with regard to time.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I will withdraw it with the understanding——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is unable to hear the statement of the gentleman.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I will withdraw the motion, with the understanding that I may renew it at a later period.

Mr. HEARD. The gentleman from Iowa asks for a few minutes more time to conclude his remarks.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not ask it now. I will ask it later.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I am now going to ask an indulgence of the House which I rarely ask. I feel, however, impelled by a sense of duty to the District Committee, and to myself as a member of that committee, to ask the House to indulge me for ten minutes, or for as much time as it gave to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], who is not a member of the committee, in order that I may present the side which the committee desire to have presented to the House. I ask ten minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question for my own information and the information of other gentlemen sitting around me. Is it not a fact that, owing to the decision of the higher court not one cent of this $147,000 can be collected from the railway company?

Mr. HEARD. That is true. There has been a decision of the Supreme Court based upon the plea of the statute of limitation, and that has never been denied by anybody. That is the present status of the case.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Then I understand there is no power to collect that money from the company, as the case now stands.

Mr. HEARD. I think that is generally conceded.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. How, then, I ask the gentleman if it is not true that this company has offered, in the event of its charter being extended, to waive the plea of the statute of limitations, and go into court and let the whole question be determined irrespective of that plea?

Mr. HEARD. That is correct.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Is it not true, further, that the District Commissioners, relying upon their power to use Congress to squeeze something out of this company that it is not legally liable for, declined that proposition?

Mr. HEARD. I decline to answer that question. The gentleman can draw his own inference.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Is it not a fact that the company offered to submit the question to the courts, waiving the plea of the statute of limitations, and that that offer has been refused by the District Commissioners?

Mr. HEARD. That is true. Now, Mr. Speaker, in that connection I desire to read a proposition submitted by the railway company to the District Commissioners and their attorney. I hope gentlemen will give me their attention, for if the District Commissioners and their attorney rely upon the equities as established in this suit which they talk of so much, then this ought to be acceptable to them. Here is the proposition:

Whereas, in the case of the District of Columbia against the Metropolitan Railway Company, defendant at law, No. 23458 on the docket of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, the Supreme Court of the United States reversed the judgment entered in said case by the said supreme court of the District of Columbia and gave judgment in favor of the said Metropolitan Railway Company on the pleas of the statute of limitations, but did not pass upon or express any opinion as to the other pleas filed in said case:

The said court of appeals of the District of Columbia is hereby authorized and empowered and is given jurisdiction to consider and determine all the pleas filed in said case by the said railroad company, except the said pleas relating to and setting up the statute of limitations, and to consider, determine, and adjudicate all the issues raised by said pleas, except the issues relating to the statute of limitations, as presented by and contained in the record of the Supreme Court of the United States; a copy of said record, duly authenticated, shall be certified by the supreme court of the District of Columbia to the said court of appeals, which said court shall have jurisdiction thereof, as though the same came before the said court of appeals upon appeal duly taken from the judgment of the supreme court of the District of Columbia holding a special term.

The company further proposed to file a written waiver of all rights accruing to said company by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the statute of limitations, and admitting and acknowledging the jurisdiction of the court of appeals under the act of reference, thus reëstablishing this case in the courts of the District with full jurisdiction in them to try it upon the record, on which it is claimed that the District is entitled to a judgment. That proposition was rejected by the District Commissioners and their attorney. Then they said they wanted an arbitration. The railroad company said, "Very well, we will have an arbitration," and the stipulation prepared by the Commissioners and the railroad company is in the hands of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON]; but the Commissioners demanded, as a preliminary to agreeing to an arbitration, or the attorney of the District demanded, that the company should waive their right to plead the question of notice, and, practically, the question of original liability, and should also agree to pay, in any event, the sum of $39,000.

Now, in view of that fact, and in view of the fact that the Commissioners demanded that the $147,000, the whole amount of which the committee did not believe was justly due, should be paid, the committee declined to recommend the payment of any sum of money by the railroad company, because we could not conscientiously recommend the full amount, and the recommendation of any less amount would put us in the position of trying to scale down what the Commissioners said was due; so we reported this bill back with the provision that the legislation herein contained should not interfere with any pending rights of the District, thus leaving the matter as we knew it would be left, in the hands of Congress to amend the bill in any way it should deem proper and require this company to pay $39,000 or $50,000, or the whole $147,000, or any other sum that they should finally believe to be due.

The gentleman from Iowa proposes to recommit this bill, and I would ask him in whose interest such a motion can be made? It is conceded by everybody that the legislation which is asked here ought to be enacted if it can be passed without injury to the public interests. Now, if the gentleman from Iowa wants to serve the public by improving the transportation facilities of this District, why does not he propose to amend this bill so as to compel the company to pay all the money which he says is due, and let the public get the benefit of the improvement in transportation facilities which will result from this legislation? The committee agrees, the House agrees, the District Commissioners agree that the company should be authorized to make the change proposed in motive power, and all that anybody has demanded is that the money claimed to be due should be paid by the company; therefore, why is not the gentleman's motion to make this company pay all this money, or whatever sum the House may think proper, and let the public get the benefit of the proposed change in motive power which the bill was originally designed to give them?

Mr. LACEY. I will ask the gentleman whether he thinks the clause that he has just read would be sufficient in and of itself to carry out the purpose?

Mr. HEARD. Certainly not.

Mr. LACEY. Would it not be proper to require the company to file a stipulation of waiver?

Mr. HEARD. We made that suggestion and the railroad company assented to it, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] preferred this amendment to the one we recommended. The company said they were willing to amend this proposition so that it should compel the company to file that waiver and also to acknowledge the jurisdiction of the court, as before stated.

Mr. BLAIR. I would like to know why it is that this company, if it has rights under the judgments of the courts, is to be compelled to surrender them in order to get useful and legitimate legislation

Mr. HEARD. Here is the record upon which the District authorities claim that they were entitled to a judgment and upon which a judgment was obtained in the supreme court of the District; but that judgment was avoided in the Supreme Court of the United States, to which the case was carried on appeal, upon the plea of the statute of limitations. Now, the proposition presented by the railroad company in our committee, and to which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] has referred, was that Congress in connection with this bill shall confer upon the court of appeals full jurisdiction to try this controversy upon all pleas except the statute of limitations; and in order that there may be no question about the authority of the court to try the issues, it is proposed that the company shall come in and waive the rights secured to them under former litigation; and this the company is willing to do.

Mr. BLAIR. Was the case tried upon the pleas to the merits?

Mr. HEARD. That is a matter which I must leave to my learned colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB]. I will simply say that according to his opinion all discretion on the part of the jury was taken away by the instructions of the court. I must be excused, however, from going further into that question.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. One minute.

Mr. HEPBURN. If the gentleman will allow me, I think I can answer the question of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BLAIR].

Mr. HEARD. The gentleman may do so in his own time. Having but one minute left I have no time to pursue this discussion now; I will resume it later. I now surrender the floor.

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Speaker, I opposed this bill when it was under consideration by the House heretofore; and subsequent investigation has convinced me that I was right in taking that position. The more this question is investigated the more indefensible seems to be the position of the committee, which is urging Congress to waive certain rights that the District of Columbia has in relation to this railroad company, and to give life again to the charter that the company has forfeited.

I find that the Fifty-second Congress appointed a committee to investigate the franchises of the District; and that committee, in closing their partial report, said in relation to street railways:

Pending the conclusion of this investigation, they strongly urge that no new legislation be had on any of the following matters—granting any new charter or extending charters to existing lines.

I find also in the tabulation of that committee a statement to which I beg to call attention, because of its importance. The Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company—in other words, the cable road—which has issued stock to the amount of $500,000, received into its treasury only $200,000 for that $500,000 worth of stock; in other words, only 40 per cent of the amount of the stock was paid into the treasury.

A MEMBER. And the stock is now worth 400.

Mr. COOMBS. The stock is worth, as the gentleman suggests, 400. We find that in ten years that stock has paid an annual dividend of over 50 per cent on the amount invested. The interests of the District have certainly not been preserved in this case.

I find that the company that is before us now asking certain favors, the Metropolitan, with stock issued to the amount of $735,000, received into its treasury only $435,000; in other words, about $300,000 went into the pockets of somebody. That road has paid, on the amount of the money paid in, an annual dividend of over 12½ per cent. I find that the Columbia Railroad Company, which has issued stock to the amount of $400,000, received into its treasury for that stock only $100,000, and it has paid dividends of 8.6 per cent per annum for the last ten years. We find that the Capitol and North O Street Railroad, which has issued $500,000 worth of stock, has received into its treasury only $223,144, and it has paid dividends of 7½ per cent on the amount paid in. Then follows a list of roads which have made no report and paid, so far as we can understand, no dividends.

Now, I claim, Mr. Speaker, that we have come to the dividing issue, which is of immense interest to the District of Columbia, in determining what shall be the future of these franchises. It is undoubtedly the policy of these men, whose stock is worth 400, 300, and 225, to buy up these railroads which are now paying no dividend, to make a consolidation, and then issue millions of dollars' worth of stock and bonds. As a result of this, the city of Washington will be in the same condition in which many of the cities of this country find themselves to-day.

I say that members of Congress owe it to the District of Columbia to listen to the voice of the people and the voice of the Commissioners, and see that the wrong now contemplated is not perpetrated. And, gentleman, I call upon you not only to vote for the amendment I have offered, that this company be compelled to pay its honest debt to the city for which a judgment has been rendered, but that, finally, the bill shall be sent back to the committee until the joint committee of the House and Senate shall be heard in relation to this matter of the franchises, and some policy decided upon which shall, while dealing fairly by the companies and paying reasonable returns upon their investments, secure to the District all remaining advantages.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOMBS. May I have about two minutes more?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of objection the gentleman will proceed.

There was no objection.

Mr. COOMBS. This investigation is going on and it will soon be completed; and I say that this House should stop where it is, give no new rights to this railroad which it does not now possess, nor settle any difficulties in which it is involved until the whole question can come up de novo before the House, and the attitude of all these transportation companies be settled in the interest of the people of the District of Columbia.

We have a city that is growing rapidly. It is fast becoming the center of the polite and scientific population of the country. It is increasing rapidly in numbers and wealth, and in a very few years these charters will be of enormous value. Let us then reserve for the people of the District of Columbia, as has been the case with some few other cities throughout the country, these rights and benefits, and not, as in the majority of cases, surrender them into the hands of private corporations regardless of the just rights of the citizens.

Mr. ALLEN was recognized.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that we are proceeding under the five-minute rule, reading the bill by sections for debate and amendment. There is no amendment pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is correct. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] withdraws the pro forma amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. I move to strike out the last word.

I just desire to be heard for a few moments on what seems to have been elaborated somewhat during this discussion—the squeezing system—an expression which gentlemen are using while engaged in the discussion of this bill.

I have been here as a member of this body for several years, and I have been watching with much interest this Washington street-railway system. I remember when I first came here there was a proposition made to incorporate a competing line to the two great street railways now in existence and running east and west through the city, and we saw the influence of these roads in this House that prevented that line from ever being constructed.

Mr. HEARD. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion for his own information? This House passed a bill after a hard fight, by 20 votes more than 2 to 1, granting a charter to this new road.

Mr. ALLEN. It has never become a law.

Mr. HEARD. No; we passed it, but it did not get through the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. And there was a great deal of filibustering in the House to keep it from passing.

Mr. HEARD. It passed all the same, though.

Mr. ALLEN. Then they undertook to make the roads give the people of the District of Columbia better facilities, and they passed this bill that required them originally, within a certain length of time, to improve their traction system and give the facilities that the people required. Neither of them complied with the requirements of the law. Both of them were compelled to have some extension of time; and one of them finally did establish a different system. This railroad, the Metropolitan road, is here now for the second or third time, asking an extension of time, while it has done nothing towards carrying out the provisions of the bill that Congress passed requiring it, under pain of forfeiture of its charter, to do this work many years ago.

Now, there has been some talk of the "squeezing" process on these roads during this discussion. But, Mr. Speaker, the street railways of this District, and all over the country, are employing that method towards the people, and have obtained from the authorities charters for their roads worth millions and millions of dollars; and still they go on with their squeezing process. This road is in a condition now that it must have further legislation or its rights will disappear; and the proposition is to make them do what in justice they should have done years ago, in building up the streets in this city, in order to entitle them to their franchise. They went into the courts. They are very anxious to do the right thing now.

> When the devil was sick the devil a monk would be;
> When the devil got well the devil a monk was he.

[Laughter.]

When this railroad gets sick then it becomes quite saintly and is willing to waive all statutes of limitation. We do not want anything of the kind. There is no necessity for having any further trial about the matter. I have no disposition as one member of this House to oppress this road or any other road, but I am unwilling to see the bill pass the House until they have shown an effort to comply with their obligations and restored to the people of the District the rights to which they were entitled under the law. I do not care about their technicalities now—and they are standing on many of them—as to whether they owe the money or not. They have a franchise from Congress worth much more than the money they owe the people of the District. They have practically forfeited the charter to Congress, in failing to do what the law required them to do. Now, I say, without considering the value of the franchise—you may call it squeezing if you wish—if anybody had known what the value of the franchise would be, probably they would not have gotten it as easily as they did. But they did get the franchise, and I am not disposed to take it away from them.

But I do say it is the business of this Congress, before any further privileges are extended to them, before any further rights are given to them, to see that they be made to do what they ought in equity and good conscience to do, and what the bill incorporating them required them to do.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I want to congratulate the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] upon the accuracy of his quotation. He seems to be about as correct in respect to that as he is with respect to his knowledge of the facts of the matter now before the House.

The gentleman's opposition to the extension of time asked for this street railway company seems to be predicated upon a general antipathy to corporations, rather than upon any particular knowledge of the circumstances of this case.

Mr. Speaker, I confess that I started out in this inquiry with my prejudices against this railway company; but when I came to examine the facts with some little care, I was obliged, in justice to myself, to reverse my opinion.

The gentleman talks about the company having failed to take any step toward complying with the law passed five years ago. I understand the fact to be that this company was given three ways in which it might apply its motive power. In endeavoring to apply one of these methods it has expended nearly $400,000, about one-fourth of which sum is absolutely lost to it. This as the result of attempting to put in what is known as the storage-battery system.

I understand also that experts who are conversant with this subject say that on the larger part of the line of the company it is absolutely impossible for it to operate a cable system and at the same time to make anything in running its cars. Does the gentleman expect the company to run its road at a loss; are either the private or the public interests to be subserved by requiring it to run its cars without profit?

This leaves simply the third method. It has made a bone fide effort to comply with the law, and it is not simply to the interest of the company and the stockholders—many of whom I understand to be persons in ordinary circumstances in life—but it is to the interests of the traveling public that this company should not be stopped, but that it shall have its time extended in which to comply with the law.

Now, from the way gentlemen talk upon this floor, it would be imagined that this company is attempting to escape a legal liability to the District of Columbia. It is true that an inferior court of the District decided against the company upon all points, in a suit brought against it to recover for these street assessments; but it is also true that when the question came before the the higher court on appeal, that higher court reversed the decision of the court below, and held that the company did not owe the District of Columbia a single solitary dollar. I know it is said that this decision was put upon the ground that the plea of the statute of limitations which the company had plead would lie; but I want gentlemen to understand that the lower court which made a mistake in one matter of law, as to the statute of limitations, would be very likely to make a mistake upon other questions of law which involved the other facts and the merits of the case.

The truth about the matter is, that there is no equity in this claim that is made against this company for $147,000 for street improvements. Under what was known as the Boss Shepherd régime the company's line, with the cobble-stones that it laid between the rails, which was a good and serviceable pavement, was taken up and a block pavement put down without the consent of the company—a substituted pavement which was worthless, and which in less than two years had to be taken up, and the company was put to an enormous expense to replace it.

Mr. COOMBS. Were not the people of the District——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I hope the gentleman will pardon me. I have but five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I understand further that the District of Columbia, without the request of the company, put down this same worthless pavement on those streets which were not then occupied by the company; and when the company came to put down its line and run along those streets, it lost the benefit of those improvements because of their worthless character, as they had to be taken out, and at an enormous expense to them the company had to put down a good pavement. And yet the court below held, and this Congress is asked virtually to sustain that holding, that this company in justice and equity is bound to pay for those improvements which were absolutely worthless to it, and which in at least one instance has actually taken a large sum of money out of its treasury. The long and short of the whole thing is that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia have come before this committee, and have sought to take an unconscionable advantage of this company. The company has offered to do everything that was right and fair.

Now, I have confidence in the manhood and integrity of the committee which has had this bill in charge and which brought it before this House. This committee tell us that it is a fact that the street railway company has said to the District, "We do not owe you a dollar; the courts have held that you can not hold us for a cent, but we are willing to do what is reasonable and right by way of a compromise with you. Permit us to have our time extended, and we are willing to waive the question of the statute of limitations, and to go into the courts and let the whole question as to whether or not we owe you be settled and determined." They have said more than that. They have said, "If you will not accept this proposition, then we will pay you about $35,000 or $40,000 by way of settlement;" but these District Commissioners, expecting that prejudice against corporations can be used here to aid them in their nefarious purposes, have said "No; we will not take one dollar from you by way of compromise, but we will squeeze the life out of you, now that we have an opportunity. No compromise will be accepted. You must pay every dollar and dime of this money for this street paving from which you got scarcely any benefit, and which money the courts have held you do not owe, or else we will come in and ask the American Congress to be small enough and contemptible enough and unconscionable enough to refuse and extension of your charter.

I am against any such infamous and unconscionable proposition as that, and will neither give my vote nor my influence to support it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I ask that the next section be read.

Mr. HEPBURN. I want to say a word here. I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that further debate is not in order on this amendment. Does the gentleman from Mississippi withdraw the pro forma amendment?

Mr. ALLEN. I do.

Mr. HEPBURN. I desire to renew it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will yield to the gentleman if he wants to be heard, but I wanted to read the next section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to offer an amendment?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I want to go on with the bill, but if the gentleman wants to be heard I will yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has agreed to recognize the gentleman from Mississippi next. Does the gentleman offer an amendment?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks made by my colleague from Mississippi [Mr. ALLEN] and also to the remarks made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON]. My colleague made two statements which have not been controverted, and which I desire to say will not be controverted here. The first statement is to the effect that this company has a very valuable franchise, and that it has now been before Congress two, three, or four times for the purpose of getting an extension of the time within which to do things which Congress ordered it to do long since, and which long since ought to have been done. That is the first statement. The second statement is that they are now here for a valuable franchise, an extension of time; and when they come here they are not proposing anything at all as a quid pro quo so far as the public are concerned.

Now, I heard the gentleman from Indiana say that the company had been imposed upon, and that the District Commissioners were trying to squeeze money out of it that the District was not entitled to; and he made the usual plea, and I for one have become tired of that plea, sick of it, sick of fancy and sick of hope. Whenever a corporation is brought into this Congress and anything is said about it, some gentleman rises and pleads for it as if a lot of widows and orphans and decent people, in ordinary circumstances, are being affected. I do not think that that has anything to do with this; but if it has, I want to bring out these plain facts, which are true, because the facts were given to me by the president or secretary—one of the Metropolitan Company.

This stock, the par value of which is $50, was obtained by the present stockholders for the payment of $30 in cash, and that is all it has ever cost. The market value of it is ninety odd cents on the market; and in addition to the fact that the company has increased its facilities and added to its plant very much and has spent three hundred and odd thousand dollars experimenting on the storage-battery system, it has paid an average of 12½ per cent dividend right along. Now, I do not think that they have been abused to any large extent.

Mr. Chairman, I for one do not consider that a man standing in his place here as a Congressman has any right to give away the public property for nothing. He would not give away his own property for nothing; and he should treat the public in the same manner. It is an idea of mine that whenever a franchise is granted, whether it shall be an increase, an extension, or an original franchise, it should be granted upon conditions that the party receiving it should pay a higher proportion of the gross receipt of income from the operation of that franchise than anybody else is willing to give; that they should come in and bid, and the bidders who tax themselves, or the party who voluntarily gives the highest amount, should receive the franchise. But gentlemen reply that this company already has its franchise. They say it has been granted. Are you going to take it away from them? Gentlemen, it has not the franchise that it is asking. It has a certain franchise, and that franchise is in litigation. That franchise has been virtually forfeited. Now, to enter into the facts of the case——

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. In a moment.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON] says that it is an inequitable claim, because the pavement which the District ordered put down in the place of the old one was a worse one than the old pavement, and ultimately they had to take it up and put down the old pavement in its place. What does that argument amount to, Mr. Chairman? It means, if it means anything, this: that when the law provides that these people shall pave within their tracks and 2 feet outside in such a manner as shall be determined by the District Commissioners that it does not mean what it says, but means simply that they shall obey the order unless they think that it is inadvisable, unless they think that the pavement ordered to be laid is worse than the old one.

Mr. KYLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the time of my colleague be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I wish to ask the gentleman from Mississippi a question. How does he claim that the franchise is forfeited?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Well, sir, I claim that the franchise was forfeited in this way: There was a plain provision of law with which the company were compelled to comply. At the time they were called upon to comply with that provision they either refused, or failed, or omitted to do so; I care not which.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. But can a franchise be forfeited without a judgment of a court?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Just wait till I get through.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. No. I would like to have an answer now. Can a franchise be forfeited without a judgment of a court?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, well; what I meant was not that there had been a judgment of forfeiture, but that there had been an equitable forfeiture, that there was ground for forfeiture.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. You do not mean, then, anything more than that the company are in a situation where the Attorney-General may file a bill and ask for a judgment of the court declaring the franchise forfeited?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What I mean is that we are in exactly the same position that I would be in if I stood in court with the right to demand the foreclosure of a mortgage whether the court had actually decreed the foreclosure or not.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. But would not the mortgagor have the right to come into court and show that he had paid the mortgage?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Yes.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. There might possibly be a defense, and if there was a defense the party would have a right to present it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, are you through with your questions?

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Yes, sir; I want to treat you respectfully and I want you to treat me in the same way.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I am trying to do it, but you ask me one question after another before I have answered the preceding ones, and I have not completed my answer to any of them yet.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. I know you have not.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Now, Mr. Speaker, Congress undertook to make a legislative forfeiture of that franchise, thereby showing the understanding of this matter by Congress. Then the matter went into court and two successive courts held that the franchise was forfeited, or rather decided against the company, and then, and then only, the company got the statute of limitation considered in its favor and the case went off on that plea.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. What is the gentleman talking about when he says that two courts have held that this charter was forfeited?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I refer to the District court and the supreme court.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There never was any such decision of the courts.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The court held that this company owed the District that $147,000, and if the company owed the $147,000 for that paving and has not paid it, then there would have followed a legislative forfeiture upon proper proceedings for that purpose.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But my friend said that the courts had decreed a forfeiture.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I did not mean that. I meant that the courts had decreed facts and conditions upon which a forfeiture necessarily would have followed.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. But the existence of a debt, if that debt did exist, was not the foundation of a forfeiture, and could not be.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The fact that the company had refused to comply with the requirements of the law and lay this pavement, was a proper foundation for the forfeiture of the charter upon a proper proceeding.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. But the pavement had been laid, and the only question was one of indebtedness.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It had been laid by the District and not by the company.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I was proceeding when I was interrupted to show the fallacy of the argument of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON]. If this company could be allowed to judge for itself and to say that a given pavement which it was ordered to lay down was not the right sort of pavement, and that therefore they would not lay it, if they could be the judge of that matter in one case they could be the judge in all cases, and thus they would have power to nullify the very law under which their franchise exists. Now, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB] says that the charter could not have been forfeited under these proceedings, and yet the gentleman from Alabama and the other members of the committee come in here and offer, as a condition from the company, that they will agree to pay this money provided the courts decide in this litigation that the charter is forfeited.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. That is an entirely different litigation. The gentleman evidently does not understand the facts of this case.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Oh, yes; I do.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. The proceedings are entirely separate, different, and distinct.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. What, then, does your argument on the floor mean, and your proposed amendment providing that this company shall pay the $147,000 if the courts decide that the charter is forfeited?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. That refers to an entirely different proceeding from that to which the gentleman is directing his attention now—just as different as night is from day.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If it applies to an entirely different proceeding, the gentleman can not be correct in his other contention that the fact of the company never having paid this money could not be made a cause of forfeiture. The gentleman says they can not be made to forfeit their charter because of that failure to pay; yet he has offered an amendment providing that if the court shall decide the charter to be forfeited the company may be permitted to pay the money and escape the forfeiture.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I did not care to go into the merits of this question again. I discussed it four weeks ago when this bill was up. But so many statements have been made which do not fit this case at all nor the facts connected with it, that I feel constrained to occupy a moment or two in going back and restating the merits of this proposition.

There have been two acts of Congress in reference to this railroad company. One, the act of March 3, 1889, requires the substitution of grooved rails on all these roads. This company has literally and absolutely complied with that act of Congress; and it took $209,084.23 to do it. Here is the affidavit of the president of the company to that effect; and the truth of the statement is not controverted. The law in that respect, then, was complied with.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I can not be interrupted now. I can not make any sort of an argument if I permit myself to be interrupted.

Mr. HEPBURN. In regard to the matter to which the gentleman is now referring, I want to make an inquiry.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If it is in regard to this matter I yield.

Mr. HEPBURN. I want to ask the gentleman whether that expenditure was not made from the proceeds of certain bonds that the company was authorized to issue? And I will ask the gentleman further in this connection whether every other expenditure that this company has made in these later days has not been the expenditure of the proceeds of bonds that the company was authorized to sell on the market?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The issue which the gentleman makes is that this company——

Mr. HEPBURN. I ask for a statement of the facts.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I am going to answer the gentleman. The issue that he makes is that this company obtained this $209,084 by issuing bonds, and that thus the company was enabled to comply with the act of Congress. What if that be true? The gentleman will not insist that the money paid to the company for these bonds was a mere gift. The bonds represent a debt for which the company is liable. There was no donation; no gift. The company incurred a liability for the amount of the bonds, and in this way complied literally with the act of Congress.

Now, another act of Congress, which gentlemen do not seem to understand fully and clearly, was passed August 6, 1890, requiring the substitution of mechanical power for horse power. It required these companies to do away with horses and adopt mechanical means of propulsion. There were but three kinds of power they could use—one the cable, another the storage battery, another the underground electric system. Now, I showed by incontrovertible evidence that the line of this company is so crooked that it can not use the cable upon it; that the cable is a physical and financial impossibility. They thought they could use the storage battery; and within thirty days after Congress passed the act I have just mentioned, this company through its board of directors began its experiments with the storage-battery system; they made an honest effort to use that system and in this effort expended $384,713. I stated four weeks ago in detail how the company expended this money.

Mr. HEARD. Of that amount $100,000 will be a loss.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not insist and never have insisted that this whole sum of $384,713 would be a loss to the company; but I do insist that this expenditure shows that the company was in earnest in its efforts to adopt the storage battery and thus comply with the requirements of the act of Congress.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Will my colleague allow me——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I can not now. Of the $384,713 expended by this company in an honest effort to use the storage battery, it is proved by the officers of the company that nearly $100,000 has been an absolute loss to the company.

Mr. COOMBS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No, sir. This loss has arisen because the storage battery has proved a complete failure; after expending this vast sum the company was unable to use the storage battery. I mention these facts to show that the company has been honestly endeavoring to conform to the act of Congress. It has been only recently developed that the storage battery can not be used; and $100,000 of the amount expended will be an absolute loss to them, as they find themselves obliged to adopt some other system.

In this condition of affairs, the company comes to Congress and asks for additional time in which to adopt some other power. What other power? They can not use the cable system; the storage-battery system has proved to be unsuccessful. They are not permitted to use the overhead trolley, and only one other system remains, because they can not emply horses under the law. So they must turn to the underground electric current system. All that they ask, then, is additional time to enable them to make experiments to ascertain the best method of applying that system.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I should like very much to have a few minutes longer.

Mr. HEARD. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague may be permitted to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. COOMBS. There will be no objection to that if the gentleman will allow me to ask him a question or two.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman has had his ten minutes. He has argued his side of the question and yet did not touch the case after all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOMBS. Now, if the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I can not yield in the few moments I have. The gentleman has presented the question from his standpoint. He is probably interested in, or is in favor of overhead trolleys or something else. I do not know what the gentleman prefers and do not undertake to say, but all of that has nothing whatever to do with the question that I am presenting.

I ask again what has this road done? It has expended the sums already mentioned, and in addition to that it has paid since 1878 up to 1890 for special assessments and street paving $103,171.08. Since 1878 it has paid in general taxation $153,552.62, making a total, with the items I have already suggested, of $850,520.95 paid by them. In addition to all this the company pays annually into the District treasury about $16,000 for taxes on its gross receipts.

Now, it is insisted that there is a judgment against this company which they ought to pay. Gentlemen talk of forfeiture suits. We are perfectly willing for the bill to pass Congress reserving all the rights of the District as against the company for forfeiture on any ground whatever. Nobody seeks to get rid of the forfeiture suits. It is simply to give them additional time to comply with the act of Congress and change their motive power.

It is argued by gentlemen that before the company asks anything at the hands of Congress it must pay what it owes. The company is willing to do that. It has paid what it owes, and there is nothing against the company now of any kind of assessment except the sum of about $300, which was presented to them within the last ten days. Not a dollar of taxation or assessment for any purpose, except this small sum just presented, stands on the books of the District of Columbia against this company which has not been paid in full. We must not allow ourselves to get confused with reference to the attitude of the company on this question, and accept the suggestion of gentlemen that the company is dodging some of its obligations. They tell us that there is a judgment against the company of $147,000. I wish to address myself to that briefly. I undertook to answer that when this question was up four weeks ago, and dislike very much to go through it again, because it seems wholly unnecessary, but briefly, for the information of gentlemen who do not seem familiar with the subject, let me state exactly what the condition is.

There is no judgment against the company. It is improper to call it so because the Supreme Court of the United States decided that the company did not owe the debt. Hence there is no judgment. But you say the company got rid of it by pleading the statute of limitations. My colleague on the committee from Alabama, Judge COBB, made that perfectly plain the other day, and I do not like to repeat his arguments for I can not make them as clearly as he did. But the company insisted that it did not owe the debt and submitted ten meritorious pleas, and two additional pleas which were the bar of the statute of limitations. The Supreme Court of the United States, after the case got there, decided in favor of the company, not considering the meritorious pleas, because, as the courts usually do, when they find the plea of the statute of limitations in favor of the company, they do not consider the others.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But the two lower courts did consider the merits and decided against the company.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Oh, no; they did not.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is just the trouble. I can not get the gentleman to understand.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I stated that the two lower courts had decided against the company on the merits of the case. In order to reach that decision they had to consider the merits.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I deny the proposition absolutely.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The judgment below was rendered for $147,000. But what did it grow out of? It grew out of paving between the rails and 2 feet outside the tracks of the company. The company insisted that it ought not to be called on to pay it. Why? It was between the years of 1871 and 1874 that the paving was done to which that reference is made.

It was done not only on the streets alone occupied by this company, but it was done on the streets of this city where the company had its chartered right to go, but where it had not then gone and where it did not go for years afterwards. The amount claimed for the pavement upon the streets where the company was then running its road is about $39,000. That was on the line from Seventeenth street through F street and up to this Capitol building. The whole amount of that paving comes to $39,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in equity and good conscience, would gentlemen here insist, if you have the power to "squeeze" them, that this road shall pay for laying down that pavement on streets which they did not then occupy, and which they did not occupy for years afterwards?

A MEMBER. Did they pay the $39,000?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No, they did not pay the $39,000. The District would not accept that, but went into court with a claim for the whole amount, and under the statute of limitations the company were relieved from paying.

Mr. HEPBURN. Do you say the company did not occupy these streets for years afterwards?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do.

Mr. HEPBURN. Did they not occupy those streets with their stringers and their cross-ties concurrently with the laying of the pavement?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman to argue that a few minutes ago.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is not that true?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. They did, and with the distinct stipulation that they should not be liable, and would not incur the expense of the paving. Now, here is the letter of the president of the company, which I hold in my hand. It is dated October 26, 1871, and signed by J. W. Thompson, president of the Metropolitan Railroad Company. I will not read all of it, but he was discussing that very question, and he says:

> We are willing to anticipate the putting down of the sleepers and the cross-ties of our contemplated extension, provided the paving be done by your contractor, without charge against us, and should be pleased if the suggestions herein contained should meet with the favor of your board.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is it your contention that the act of Congress imposing upon them the duty to lay these pavements could be waived by an agreement?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Why, there was no act of Congress, and the gentleman can not produce it between the lids of any book. There was no act of Congress that required them to do it. It was a ruling of the old board of public works.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr SAYERS. Before the gentleman takes his seat I should like to ask him a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. SAYERS. Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee this question: I understood the gentleman to say that in order to make up this sum of $147,000 against the railroad it was necessary to make charges against the railroad for pavement upon streets not then occupied by the road.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SAYERS. This is the question I wish to propound to the gentleman: Did not the railroad have a charter to construct its line along the streets which were so improved?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. SAYERS. The gentleman answers yes. Now, in view of the charter that had been granted to that railroad to construct its line along those streets, could Congress have granted a charter to any other company to construct a road along the same street?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think it could. They do it constantly, requiring the two companies to use the same track.

Mr. SAYERS. You think that could have been done after this company had already been chartered?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Certainly. They use the same lines concurrently in many places.

Mr. SAYERS. But they could not take the street away from this company?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I have only a very little time.

Mr. WASHINGTON. We will give you plenty of time if you will discuss this question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will do my best.

Mr. WASHINGTON. You have read a letter from the president of this company, making a proposition to the District Commissioners, as I understand, that they shall pave certain streets in advance of the occupation of those streets by this railroad company upon the condition that the railroad company shall not be assessed for that paving. Is not that clearly an effort on the part of this company to avoid their proper responsibility, and the proper charge for the paving of those streets when the track was laid?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is a proper question.

Mr. WASHINGTON. That is the milk in the whole thing.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, right upon that point, if the gentleman will examine all the facts in this case he will find that when these steps were taken in 1871, this railroad had complied absolutely and perfectly with the laws of Congress which required them on the line where they were running cars to put down cobblestones between the rails. That cobblestone pavement was in perfect order, but this old board of public works, not Congress, said to them, "You must take up your cobblestones and must put down this wooden Nicholson pavement," that was then substituted.

They protested against it, and said, "We have complied with the act of Congress and have got our road in perfect order." The board of public works, without their consent, tore up their tracks and substituted the old wooden pavement, and, as we all know, in two years it had rotted to such an extent that this company had to go to work and pave again with these cobblestones.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Is it not also a fact that the company never did get any benefit from that pavement?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Never.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. On the streets that they did not then occupy?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Never; and they got no benefit of those cross-ties which my friend from Iowa refers to, on those tracks where they contemplated running their road in the future.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. That is the point I wanted to bring out.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. They got no benefit from it, because by the time they were ready to run their tracks on those streets the wood pavement which had been put down was rotten and gone, and they were compelled to incur the expense of putting down this rock.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Will my colleague yield to me for a question again?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Has the statement of facts been carried to the court, and has the question been adjudicated as to whether or not the company is liable for the pavement of those streets? Has that question been settled in courts?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It has not.

Mr. WASHINGTON (continuing). Irrespective of the question as to whether this charter shall be forfeited unless this company does certain things?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It has not.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Then you should amend your bill and allow the proper law officer to institute suits in the court, and make them pay every dollar.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. That is the very thing the company offered to do.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. One at a time.

Mr. WASHINGTON. That is far better than to forfeit charters, because Congress does not want the charter of any road; but we do want to make this company, as well as every other company in this District, pay every dollar it owes on every tax properly assessed against its property.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We had that very identical proposition, word for word as the gentleman has made it, before the Committee on the District of Columbia. We had before us the representative of the District, Mr. Thomas, the District attorney; the representative of the United States who brought this forfeiture suit, Mr. Birney; we had the officers of the railroad corporation; and there and then this proposition was made, to submit it to the courts, waiving the plea of the statute of limitations; and the officers of the District of Columbia, and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia declined to do it.

Mr. WASHINGTON. It should go to the court, because the court has the power to summon witnesses and determine the matter. You can not get at the facts and dispose of the matter in a committee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is right; but the representatives of the District of Columbia refused to do it.

Mr. HEARD. Then there was talk about arbitration.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then a proposition was made of arbitration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, as much of the gentleman's time has been taken up by interruptions, I ask that his time be extended.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I ask that it be extended ten minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the time of his colleague be extended ten minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. REED. Would it not be a good idea to make a proviso that nobody should plead the statute of limitations?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It looks a little that way. The old board of public works tore up the old pavement, which was a good one, conforming exactly with the requirements of the charter of this company, and put down a wooden pavement, which in a few years became rotten, and then they took that up and required this railroad to again put down cobblestones, which they did, and paid every dollar of it.

Now, then, it seems to me that inasmuch as they got no benefit from the extension of the line of cross-ties on the streets where they contemplated extending their road, they ought not to be required to pay for it. What does it amount to? The whole amount incurred by the city in taking up their good track and in substituting a bad one along the line where they have actually operated the railroad was $39,000, and the District of Columbia paid it. Now, the very utmost that can be required, under any circumstances, it seems to me, would be to make this railroad pay that $39,000. They offered to do that. They offered in the presence of this District Committee, if the committee would agree to it, to pay this $39,000. They offered to do that in the presence of the full committee, in presence of the representative of the District of Columbia, Mr. Thomas, in the presence of the representative of the Government, Mr. Birney, the Assistant Attorney-General. Was not that fair?

Mr. SAYERS. I had information that they were willing to pay $50,000.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will answer the gentleman on that point. I am sure I do not want anything except what is right in this matter, and I have given, and the District Committee have given, more attention to this question than to any other single question pending before them in this Congress. Now as to the $50,000, some gentlemen present had suggested a payment of $39,000, and Mr. Thomas, the attorney of the District, an able lawyer, said to the representatives of the company, "You ought to pay $50,000 to get this bill through." The District Committee, after hearing those gentlemen and discussing the matter, agreed to require the company to pay $50,000 by way of compromise.

We went to the officers of the company and they said: "If you gentlemen, representing the interests of the United States, if the District Committee fix the amount at $50,000 we will endeavor to comply with the requirement and pay that amount." The attorney for the District, Mr. Thomas, was willing, the Assistant Attorney-General, Mr. Birney, was willing, and publicly, in the presence of the committee, those gentlemen agreed that the amount was sufficient. The committee were willing to recommend that amount, and those gentlemen agreed to it, but the Commissioners of the District alone said: "We do not think the case ought to be compromised in that way." Mr. Birney, representing them, said: "You will get nothing if you go on with your litigation; you will lose not only this $50,000 which the company are now willing to pay, but you will lose the whole $147,000, and not a dollar of that money will go into the Treasury at all."

The gentleman now facing me, Mr. COGSWELL, my colleague on the committee, and others, said: "Let us leave it to arbitration; in other words, let us leave it to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia." The third proposition was to refer the whole question to the court of appeals of the District, the plea of the statute of limitations being withdrawn.

Mr. WASHINGTON. That is where it ought to go, to be tried upon its merits.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The railroad company said they would agree to that; but again the District Commissioners interposed and said they would not agree to it. After all three of these propositions were rejected, then this provision, the third section, was put into the bill by the committee.

This bill, if you pass it as it is, leaves them free to go and pursue their legal remedy in the courts of the District. On the other hand, if Congress believes that the company ought to be made to pay the $39,000 or the $50,000, I, for one, speaking for myself only, will not object to that amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Why not the $147,000?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Because they do not owe that amount.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. If they owe anything at all why do not they owe that amount?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. They do not owe that amount, and I have tried to show you why. The $147,000 is arrived at by charging this company for paving streets that they did not occupy.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. How is the $50,000 computed, which you are willing to accept as a compromise?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. On the basis of the streets that the company did occupy.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Have you figures showing that that is the proper proportion?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Certainly; and we have submitted them.

Mr. ALLEN. The gentleman says that the company did not occupy certain streets, but did they not have a charter authorizing them to occupy those streets; were they not required to occupy them before that time, and were they not permitted to leave them unoccupied merely as a matter of grace?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No, sir; the charter, according to my recollection of it, was merely permissive. At that time there was no period fixed in the charter within which the company should construct the road. They were merely given permission to occupy those streets. Congress could have taken the right away from them, but did not.

Mr. COOMBS. The gentleman has claimed that because this company were not occupying certain streets which they had a right under their charter to occupy, they should not be required to pay for the paving. I would ask the gentleman if it is not true that property holders on those streets whose property at that time was unavailable on account of the lack of grading and other facilities were obliged to pay for the pavement; and what right has this railroad company to be exempted from burdens which fell upon the private citizen? I have in my hand a letter from a gentleman stating that he was compelled to pay $1,400 of assessment on property which did not come into the market until years afterwards.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman from New York asks me whether certain citizens were not compelled to pay for these pavements——

Mr. COOMBS. Whether all the property owners were not compelled to pay.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I suppose property holders in all parts of this city were compelled to pay for pavements upon streets upon which their property was situated and where pavements were laid down; but why charge this company for a pavement that was absolutely worthless and which was laid down upon streets which the company did not use?

Mr. COOMBS. The gentleman made another point—that the company had suffered a loss of $100,000 out of nearly $400,000 that it had spent in introducing the storage-battery system. Now, is not the gentleman aware that the larger part of this money was spent upon a motor which the company itself owned and out of which they expected to make a large amount of money? In other words, was not this an outside speculation on the part of this company?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No, there was no evidence of that kind before the committee—not a particle.

Mr. COOMBS. I have that evidence before me.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. What evidence has the gentleman of that fact?

Mr. COOMBS. The evidence of persons who were themselves stockholders in the company at that time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman give me the name of some man who will testify to such a thing?

Mr. COOMBS. No; I will not, because I am not permitted to do so.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I believe there is nothing in any such allegation. I do not know any facts sustaining it. In my remarks four weeks ago I set out in detail how this company had expended $384,713 in an earnest effort to use the storage battery, and had failed to make it a success.

Mr. HUDSON. I would like to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will yield.

Mr. HUDSON. Is it not a fact that the United States courts in this District tried the question between the city and the Metropolitan Railroad Company, and that it was determined on due trial in a court of competent jurisdiction that this Metropolitan Railroad Company owed the District of Columbia $147,000?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, I will say this——

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HUDSON. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended.

Mr. ABBOTT obtained the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. The point which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HUDSON] undertakes to make has been answered half a dozen times already.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If I am to answer the gentleman categorically, I say "No," that there is no judgment in any court of the United States against this railroad company for a dollar.

Mr. HUDSON. Why? Because the company interposed as a legal defense the statute of limitations.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Because the cases were never tried on the meritorious pleas.

Mr. HUDSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I can show that he is mistaken. I have just sent for the book.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. ABBOTT] has been recognized.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will not occupy further time; I did not intend to consume so much time as I have occupied.

Mr. ABBOTT. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some confusion and misunderstanding in regard to the vital question involved in this case. I believe that I can explain in a few minutes the situation and the issues as now presented to this House. I am a member of this committee, and while some gentlemen have been disposed to criticise the committee I wish to say that I am the only member in the minority.

Now, that this case may be perfectly understood, I wish to state that there is now pending before the court of appeals of the District of Columbia a suit for the forfeiture of this charter. That suit is based upon two grounds. The first is—

1. For failure to so change its motive-power within one year from the joint resolution of July 22, 1892.

There was a joint resolution passed requiring this company within the period of one year to change its motive power. Subsequently, I believe, the time was extended. The second ground upon which this suit is based is—

2. For failure to pay a certain canceled judgment obtained by the District of Columbia against it for paving between and adjoining its tracks in the years 1871–'75, in accordance with the provisions of the appropriation act of March 3, 1891.

This suit was instituted in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and Judge Bradley, of that court, rendered a decision adverse to the Government. From that judgment an appeal was taken to the court of appeals, where the case is now pending.

Now, my position is that if we pass this bill in its present form it will necessarily waive the rights of this Government as against the company. In my judgment, we might as well pass a charter unqualified in its terms as to pass this bill. The provision which says that the forfeiture shall depend upon the action of the court of appeals of this District is in itself inconsistent with the other provisions of the bill.

Now, the majority of the committee was frank enough to admit that if this bill be passed, it will vacate the forfeiture proceedings in so far as the first ground of forfeiture is concerned. The language of the committee is:

The passage of the pending bill will necessarily vacate the suit pending on the first cause of forfeiture, that is for failure of the railroad to change its motive power within the time mentioned.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is the only ground upon which this suit can rest. The other ground of forfeiture is not sound, in my judgment, and such is the opinion of able lawyers on this floor. If, therefore, we pass this bill we thereby vacate the only ground upon which forfeiture may be had in this case; and hence we might just as well pass a straightforward bill vacating the court proceedings at once. Now I wish to call attention for a moment to the opinion of Judge Bradley, of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, as delivered in this case, and to the authorities which he cited:

In the case of the Attorney-General vs. the Petersburg and Roanoke R. R. 6 Ired., 436, the court says upon this subject:

"If the sovereign, with us the lawmaking power, with a distinctive knowledge of the breach of duty by the corporation, knowledge declared by the Legislature, or so clearly to be inferred from its own archives that the contrary can not be, thinks proper by an act to remit the penalty, or to continue the corporate existence, or to deal with the corporation as lawfully and rightfully existing, notwithstanding such known default, such conduct must be taken as in other cases of breaches of conditions to be intended as a declaration that the forfeiture is not insisted on, and therefore as a waiver of the previous defaults."

To the same effect are the following cases:

People vs. President, etc., Manhattan Company, 9 Wend., 351.

The State vs. Fourth New Hampshire Turnpike Company, 15 N. H., 162.

Central Cross Town Railroad Company vs. Twenty-third Street Railroad Company, 54 How. Pr., 186.

White Creek Turnpike Company vs. Davidson County, 8 Tenn. Ch., 226.

Now, if you recognize the right of this company, as is proposed to be done in this bill, I do not care how many qualifications you may place on it, it will be a recognition of the existence of the corporation and of its right to continue in power, and indeed we establish their right to continue on a condition, and therefore the Supreme Court of the United States would doubtless hold, in any event, that this legislation would mean a vacation of any forfeiture proceedings.

I wish now, Mr. Speaker, to call my colleagues' attention—the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB]—especially to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in this very case.

[Here the hammer fell].

Mr. CULBERSON. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague be allowed ten minutes additional time.

There was no objection.

Mr. ABBOTT. I want to call attention to the language of Judge Bradley in rendering the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in this case and reported in 132 United States Supreme Court Reports:

The defendant filed twelve several pleas to the action, the eleventh and twelfth being pleas of the statute of limitations. Issue was taken upon all the pleas except these two—

Why, gentlemen have been asserting that the issues were not tried in this case—

Issue was taken upon all the pleas except these two, and they were demurred to. The court sustained the demurrer and the case was tried on the other issues, and a verdict found for the plaintiff.

Now, that is the language of Judge Bradley himself in rendering the decision in that case. I am reminded by the discussion had to-day, especially by the position taken by my friend from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], that his argument amounts to just as much as might be made in a collateral proceeding before a court of justice, wherein he undertakes to go behind the judgment taken, and the facts on which the judgment was rendered.

Why, any lawyer knows that whatever facts may be involved in the trial of the cause, when the cause is settled on the facts they cease to be facts any longer as having any bearing on the case. They are, so to speak, functus officio. Everything is merged and gone into judgment, and the judgment is the highest, best, and only authority. It is conclusive.

But I will go back for a moment and state that this suit was brought originally in the district court of the District of Columbia and tried in that court with a jury in the box, on ten issues presented, two of them having been eliminated by the demurrer. The case was tried on the other ten issues. The jury heard the evidence, heard the case tried, and they rendered a judgment against the company for $147,000.

An appeal was taken from that judgment of the district court of the District of Columbia to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and there that judgment was affirmed, as may be found in 4th Mackey's Reports, which was referred to by Judge Bradley in rendering his opinion in the case. That is the whole question; and I say, therefore, without going back to the facts as to whether the company occupied the streets at that time or did not occupy them, or whether the work done by the District of Columbia for the benefit of the company was of value to them or not, that is not the question. These facts were adjudicated and settled by the district court and by the supreme court of the District, and we have no right to go behind the judgment and gather up the facts which we may gather from the attorneys in the case.

It has been said by my friends from Tennessee and Alabama that the jury was not properly instructed. I ask my friends from Alabama and Tennessee how do they know that?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. From the record.

Mr. ABBOTT. Have you presented the record?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Yes, sir.

Mr. ABBOTT. If you will show that I will be very much obliged.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. That was an admitted fact before the committee.

Mr. ABBOTT. The supreme court of the District affirmed the judgment of the court below, and after this lapse of time we can not go back and criticise the judgment of the courts of the District, especially in the absence of the record. Everything merged in that judgment of the court, and we have nothing to do with the facts behind it.

Now, I want to further read from the same decision of Judge Bradley, of the Supreme Court of the United States, who says:

The case is brought here by writ of error, which brings up for consideration the bill of exceptions at the trial, and the ruling upon the demurrer to the pleas of the statute of limitations. It is conceded that if the court below erred in sustaining the demurrer the judgment must be reversed. That question will therefore first be considered.

Now, they never considered the issues in the case. They merely passed upon the ruling of the court below in sustaining the demurrer to the statute of limitations.

The officers of the District of Columbia had always heretofore held to the old rule, that the statute of limitations did not run against the sovereign. Nullum tempus occurrit regi. So you see that was the only question that was considered. The equities involved in the case were untouched by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. ALLEN. The only courts that have passed on the merits of the case decided against the railroad company and in favor of the District?

Mr. ABBOTT. Yes; two courts of the District decided against the railroad, and that judgment stands unsatisfied.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. How could that judgment stand unsatisfied if it was reversed by the Supreme Court?

Mr. ABBOTT. It was reversed on the statute of limitations.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Then there is no judgment in force?

Mr. ABBOTT. It is not such a judgment as an execution could be issued upon. My friend and I understand that. I am too good a lawyer not to know that.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. The judgment is utterly worthless now, is it not?

Mr. ABBOTT. The judgment is dead as a judgment; but here is a railroad company coming in and asking valuable franchises at the hands of this Congress, and we say to them, "You have taken advantage of a technical exception and have secured a reversal of a judgment; but you have not answered upon the merits of the case."

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Then if we are proposing to give them a new franchise that is worth something, why not let them pay for it and let past history go?

Mr. ABBOTT. If they will pay off this judgment without interest, I would vote to recharter them.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. But there is no judgment. Let us have them pay for what they are getting now, and let the dead past bury its dead, and get rid of this litigation.

Mr. ABBOTT. I know that is a railroad lawyer's plea.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Oh, no.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Were there not errors assigned by the railroad company on other grounds than the plea of the statute of limitations, which errors the court above did not examine?

Mr. ABBOTT. That is true. I believe they assigned ten errors.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. In other words the company, outside of the statute of limitations, was insisting to the court above that repeated errors had been committed by the court below under the other pleas.

Mr. ABBOTT. Yes, but those were not passed upon.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will it interrupt my colleague upon the committee if I ask him a question?

Mr. ABBOTT. No.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I understand my colleague to say he would be in favor of allowing the bill to pass, provided they would pay the $147,000?

Mr. ABBOTT. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Upon the ground that that is the exact amount that they would owe for this pavement. Now, I should like to ask my colleague upon what principle he would seek to charge them with any more than the paving on the lines of road at that time in operation?

Mr. ABBOTT. My colleague does not seem to understand me. That is a matter that has already been adjudicated. I am not going behind the judgment to ascertain the facts. I simply rely upon the judgment. That is the way lawyers do, rely upon the judgment, and not go behind it.

Mr. REED. If the gentleman from Texas will allow me, would not a lawyer recognize the right, or rather the duty, of the attorney of a corporation to plead the statute of limitations?

Mr. ABBOTT. Certainly.

Mr. REED. Would it not be his absolute duty?

Mr. ABBOTT. Yes.

Mr. REED. Then why should that be brought into the case? If this company are asking for a franchise which Congress considers valuable, and if Congress wants to charge them for it, why should not that be done, and this matter of the statute of limitations be buried? In other words, is the statute of limitations a right given to anybody to be exercised at his peril, or is it a right to be exercised necessarily, by the attorney of a corporation? Would a corporation officer have any right to do anything but plead the statute of limitations under such circumstances?

Mr. ABBOTT. I think not.

Mr. REED. Then ought not that to be ancient history, instead of being rehashed into modern history?

Mr. ABBOTT. I will answer that by saying that this company is seeking a very valuable franchise, and it is seeking to avoid another statute which in my judgment will forfeit its charter. Now, if it wants to save its life, let it go and do equity, because the statute of limitations ought not to run against equitable claims——

Mr. REED. I know the gentleman will be kind enough to allow me to make the point——

Mr. ABBOTT. Yes.

Mr. REED. Supposing there was no other defense except the statute of limitations, there is no connection between the amount which is barred by that statute and the value of the proposed franchise, is there? And one is not in any sense the measure of the other, is it?

Mr. ABBOTT. No, accurately speaking, it is not.

Mr. REED. Now this being the case, why should you insist upon their paying an amount which has no relation whatever to the transaction under consideration? If you believe——

Mr. ABBOTT. Let me answer that. I do that because I know of no other measure of damages for the failure of the company to comply with the requisites of the act of Congress. And while this may not be an accurate measure of damage, I know of no other way by which to put it in the situation that it ought to have been in if it had done justice.

Mr. REED. Do not you think that that matter beclouds the thing and narrows it too much——

Mr. ABBOTT. No, I think not.

Mr. REED. And therefore, is it not rather unfair to present it?

Mr. ABBOTT. I do not think it is unfair.

Mr. REED. If you have any sum that you think the company ought to pay before Congress should grant further franchise, that is one matter; but why should you tell them they must waive the statute of limitations, which they had a right to plead, and which they did plead successfully?

Mr. ABBOTT. I think that if a company is to be rechartered it ought to do justice before asking further favors.

Mr. REED. You are assuming that in pleading the statute of limitations it did not do justice, and that is an assumption contrary to law. The presumption of law is that the plea of the statute of limitations is a proper thing to do, it being the duty of the attorney to plead it.

Mr. ABBOTT. The gentleman will not contend, because he loans his neighbor $1,000 and he permits the statute of limitations to be perfected against him, that the neighbor ought not in some way to remunerate him for his indulgence. His neighbor would not be honest if he took advantage of the statute.

Mr. REED. The law says not.

Mr. ABBOTT. I am talking about your conscience as well as the law.

Mr. REED. A corporation attorney is obliged to plead the statute.

Mr. ABBOTT. The lawyer is.

Mr. REED. And the corporation officers are obliged to plead the statute.

Mr. ABBOTT. But the stockholders and officers behind them ought to do justice to the public before they demand anything from the Government.

Mr. REED. But the presumption of law is that they did do justice.

Mr. ABBOTT. Oh, no; not in pleading the statute of limitations.

Mr. REED. Certain it is that that is the presumption of law, or else the law is unjust.

Mr. ABBOTT. The gentleman must know that all the law books tell us the plea of the statute of limitations is not a meritorious plea.

[Here the hammer fell.]

[Mr. COBB of Alabama withholds his remarks for revision. See Appendix.]

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, in the discussion of this question we are too apt to get aside from the fundamental matter—the act of incorporation of this company. In order to discuss the question intelligently we need to know the initial rights of this company; and knowing those rights we can proceed with proper knowledge in the consideration of subsequent events. This company was incorporated July 1, 1864; and the first corporator mentioned in that act was the chairman of the board of public works, who thus appears to have made a contract with himself according to the statement of the gentleman from Alabama. Mr. Alexander R. Shepherd is the first incorporator——

Mr. COBB of Alabama. The fact is that this work was given out by contract. There was a board of public works that let out work of this kind by contract.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. And the board of public works superintended the contractor, did it not?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Yes, sir; I suppose so. I do not know; but I think that is the truth.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Section 4 of this act of incorporation is as follows:

And be it further enacted, That said corporation hereby created shall be bound to keep said track, and for the space of 2 feet beyond the outer rail thereof, and also the space between the tracks, at all times well paved and in good order without expense to the United States or to the city of Washington.

Observe the language—

Without expense to the United States or the city of Washington.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Certainly; but the gentleman should remember in this connection that they had already paved the whole route that they had occupied.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Not in 1864, because this pavement was not laid until eight or nine years later. Now, section 5 of this act goes farther and says:

Nothing in this act shall prevent the Government at any time at their option from altering the grade or otherwise improving the avenues and streets occupied by said roads, or the city of Washington from so altering or improving such streets and avenues and the sewerage thereof as may be under their respective authority and control; and in such event it shall be the duty of said company to change their railroad so as to conform to such grade and pavement.

Now, there is one other section, Mr. Speaker, which I will read here in connection with this matter—section 6:

And be it further enacted, That this act may at any time be altered, amended, or repealed by the Congress of the United States.

Again, it has been stated in the discussion before the House to-day that there was no limit of time in this original act of incorporation. But section 17 of the act provides as follows:

And be it further enacted, That unless said corporation shall make and complete their street railways between the Capitol and Seventeenth street west within four months after the company shall have been organized, and the railways on the other routes herein described within one year after the company shall have been organized, then this act shall be null and void, and no rights whatever shall be acquired under it.

Now, they did not do the work within the time specified.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow me just there?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I will state the matter plainly first. They came before Congress in 1865, by the act of January 3, 1865, and got an extension of time for one year with a proviso—

That the line from Seventeenth street to the Capitol be completed, occupied, and running within thirty days from the passage of this act.

Did they do that? Not at all. Again they came on March 3, 1865, with still another amendment, and in section 3 of the act of March 3, 1865, we find this language:

That section 17—

That is the original act of incorporation—

be and hereby is so amended as to allow said corporation three years from the date of the approval of this act in which to complete the railways herein described and those described in the act to which this is amendatory.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Certainly.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Do you suppose that Congress would have allowed the extension of time if the company had not been able to show good reason; and does not this extension of time to the company put it in the same position as if in the original act the same time had been given for the completion of the work as was given to them by the new act of extension?

Mr. ALLEN. It has been stated during the discussion of this question that there was no limitation at all.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. That was a mistake of my colleague. But it did not put the company at any disadvantage that there was an extension. It was the presumption that the extension was granted to them for good reasons, and it puts them in precisely the same position as though the extension had been embodied in the original act.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New Hampshire may be permitted to proceed for ten minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. In response to the gentleman from Alabama, let me state that this act certainly does show that the Congress of the United States, at that period at least, was dealing with care and with favor towards the Metropolitan Railroad.

Now, what is this claim in regard to the $147,000, when it is divested of all mysticism, and brought down to plain, legitimate facts, and not fancies? The facts are these: that the railroad had not, in any of these extensions of time, completed the road west of Seventeenth street, and that it was not completed when the board of public works came into power; for then they were simply claiming that they were about to do it, and under that authority Mr. Thompson wrote the letter which has been read here on the floor, asking permission to put in the cross-ties and sleepers, provided the pavement was not to be charged to the company.

But the board of public works then in authority had no right or power to make any such contract; and if they had had authority to do so it would not in the slightest degree disturb the equities of the case, for the reason that the only purpose of the suggestion was that there should not be an additional expense to the District of Columbia, which otherwise would result from the delay.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Will the gentleman permit another question? Do you suppose, if nothing had been said, and the board of public works had gone on paving the unoccupied streets, that they could have come on the company finally and made them pay for this work in advance of the occupation of the streets?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. That is not a question which pertains to the subject at all.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Oh, yes.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. For if the contract, as you call it, which was illegal in its inception and illegal in its purpose, had not been made, and the company had gone on at any time to complete the tracks, it would have torn up the pavements right through the center of the streets, and the whole cost would have been charged to them and not to the city, exactly as the preliminary matter was assessed, the only difference being that the methods adopted were less expensive to the railroad company. It was for the benefit of the railroad company that that was done, and I understand that that reduced charge is just what the court passed upon when they found that this company owed the District $147,000.

Now, still further, the company has already been granted every privilege which it has asked for. It has not come before Congress for one thing which it has not received. It has been permitted to go dawdling along, in defiance of the act of 1890. Why? Under the pretext that it was trying to introduce a storage-battery car. Now, so long as the gentleman has been in the city he has not seen more than one or two storage-battery cars ever run on the route of the Metropolitan road. He never has seen that more than once or twice a week; and more than two years ago the company knew just as well as it knows now that the storage-battery system was a failure. And yet it has kept up this pretext of running a car now and then, in order that it might make before Congress just exactly the claim that it is making here to day.

Now, why did the statute of limitation run out? Because all the three years during which the statute ran in this District, the company was suggesting this and suggesting that to the authorities of the District of Columbia, and in the change of those authorities they let the three years lapse, a mere neglect on their part. Now, should we come in here and give this company, which has not done or attempted in good faith to do what the Congress of the United States has demanded of it, the right to go scot free from the expense which the District of Columbia has been put to on its account? There is not a solitary instance where the authorities of the District of Columbia have done an injurious act toward the Metropolitan Railroad Company, and the gentleman can not point out any.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I can point out half a dozen.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Let us have them. If you will extend my time I will be glad to hear of them here and now.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Was it not imposing on the company to make them tear up a good track and make them put down one that was not worth putting down, and which they had to take up in a year or two and put down the old track again?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. I answer the gentleman's question by saying that there was not any track there.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Oh, yes; that was on the line of track which they were occupying with their cars from Seventeenth street to the Capitol.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. If that is not satisfactory, I will say to the gentleman one thing in direct answer, and that is that the Metropolitan Railroad Company suffered in conjunction with every property holder in the city of Washington, no more and no less, and that it was no more of a fraud and no more of a hardship on the Metropolitan Railroad Company than it was upon every property holder along the line where that pavement was laid, and if you propose to relieve the Metropolitan Railroad Company, it is high time that you propose to relieve the citizens of the District of Columbia.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. But you are shifting your ground now. You said I could not point to a single instance in which there was an imposition upon the railroad, and now you say the imposition was the same as upon the citizens of the District of Columbia.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But I have not admitted that it was an imposition upon the railroad company, or upon the citizens. It was an honest attempt upon the part of the board of public works of the District of Columbia to make this city a beautiful city, and put upon the streets the very best pavement that the board of public works knew of at that time.

Mr. HEARD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Yes.

Mr. HEARD. Does the gentleman from New Hampshire know that at the time that wooden pavement was put down the law required that the cost of putting down the pavement should be assessed, one-third against the abutting property owners (one-sixth on each side) and two-thirds against the District of Columbia?

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Yes; I am aware of that.

Mr. HEARD. Now, does the gentleman know further that the assessment was made according to law, and that the property holders on either side of the street paid that assessment, and that the law fixed the other part on the District of Columbia? That was the law at that date and the law was pursued.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Now, if in pursuance of that law the authorities of the District of Columbia did not deduct from the whole expense of that pavement the amount which was chargeable to the Metropolitan Railroad or any other railroad running through the streets of Washington or anywhere in the District of Columbia, it committed a fraud upon the Government and the people, and the Metropolitan Railroad Company is not entitled to the benefit of it.

Mr. HEARD. The gentleman will not insist that they committed a fraud under the law; the law did not authorize them to do it; the law did not authorize the assessment of the amount against the company.

Mr. ALLEN. Read the charter.

Mr. HEARD. The charter authorized them to do what they had done; and the record affirmatively shows that they did make a pavement, according to the requirements of the charter, and kept the pavement in repair.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. But this very charter which I have read shows that the authorities had the right to change that pavement as often as they wished. It is also evident that they made a mistake in putting down the wooden pavement, and that subsequently they had to put in some other pavement. In accordance with section 5, which I have read, of the charter of the Metropolitan Company, and under section 4, that company was bound to keep the space between its tracks at all times well paved and in good order without expense to the United States or to the city of Washington, and a space of 2 feet from the outer rail on either side.

Mr. HEARD. The pleadings show that the District authorities admit that the company had, in compliance with the provisions of the charter, put in a pavement and kept it in repair. Now, the District, through the board of public works, took up that pavement and put in a wooden pavement, and within two or three years that was rotten, and then the company again had to repave between its tracks, which it did, and paid for it.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Now, I will ask the gentleman a question. Does he claim that under the charter or any provision of law the Metropolitan Company could dictate to the authorities of the District of Columbia what kind of pavements they should use?

Mr. HEARD. I contend that under the provisions of the law they had complied with their charter requirements, and that when this wooden pavement was put in by the board of public works, about which it has been stated there was some job and which turned out to be of no account, they then required the company to put in another pavement. They required them to put in the same pavement that they had laid before.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended so that he may answer that question.

Mr. HEARD. I ask that the gentleman be given as much time as I have taken from him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much time does the gentleman ask?

Mr. HEARD. I ask that he have five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. Now, it does not matter what the mistakes of twenty-five years ago were or were not. The rights of the company are established by their charter and by subsequent acts of Congress. The charter required them to do this paving, and there is no subsequent act of Congress which relieves them from it. That is my answer.

Now, I want to ask the gentleman from Missouri another question. It is usual to hear the report from the Commissioners read when a bill reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia is pending in the House. I would like to know if the Commissioners of the District have reported on this bill, and if so, why their report has not been given to the House?

Mr. HEARD. I will state to the gentleman from New Hampshire that the Commissioners' report, I suppose, has been read to the House. If it has not been it is the privilege of the gentleman from New Hampshire, or anybody else, to have it read in his time.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I will say to the gentleman that the Commissioners when before the committee said they were perfectly willing and wanted this improvement done. They said we do not want to interfere with this company; we do not want to forfeit their charter; we do not want to organize a new company; we want this company to remain as it is, and we want them to do this work, but we want them to pay us the $147,000.

Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire. And that $147,000 is simply the amount that the government of the District of Columbia has expended on this railroad company, a company which has always paid good dividends, a company whose stock is away above par, two or three times, and a company which can well afford to pay its honest debts to the District of Columbia; and if the company can not pay its honest debts to the District, its charter ought to be repealed.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. It is willing to pay its honest debts, and the question is whether this amount is an honest debt.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I call attention to the fact that there is no amendment pending.

Mr. HUDSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I do not know whether I can say what I want to say in five minutes, but I will try. As I understand this question, without going over the legal grounds that have been stated to the House, the charter of this company, which was granted in 1864, I believe, provided that it should be subject to the police regulations of this District, and the company accepted its charter with that condition, and it is a part of the contract between the company and the District. An effort has been made here by gentlemen defending this company in its efforts to have its elapsed time extended, to argue that an injustice has been done the company, and to claim that it was perfectly justifiable in pleading the statute of limitations against the claim of the District government. There are courts in the District, properly organized, and there is no question but that they are presided over by just, fair, honest judges.

The matters in dispute between the District and this company were brought before the courts by a suit against this company for a certain amount of money claimed to be due to the District. Twelve grounds of defense were set up by the company. The last two grounds were based on the statute of limitations. The court overruled that plea and the issue was tried upon its merits. Now, I do not think it can be charged that there was anything wrong done by the District. The court was a fair court, and its judgment on the main question unimpeached. Of course, it may be argued, as attorneys on one side or the other will argue, that the matter was not tried fairly, but the decision has not been reversed by the Supreme Court, nor has there been any unfavorable comment upon that decision. Consequently I feel justified in saying that it was determined by the court that this company did owe the District $147,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. The District and the United States together.

Mr. HUDSON. Yes; the District and the United States.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Oh, no; not one dollar to the United States.

Mr. HUDSON. Well, I do not want my time taken up by a side discussion. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is claimed that the company had a perfectly legal right to plead the statute of limitation. That is granted upon our side. But, upon the other hand, it has always been considered that when a man pleads the statute of limitations against a neighbor, he contemplates going out of business relations with that neighbor, and ordinarily where a man has plead the statute of limitations as a defense in a suit for money borrowed, he does not go to the same source to borrow money again, because if he did the party would not lend him until he had paid the old debt.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Who made that statute of limitation?

Mr. HUDSON. The State of Maryland, as I understand; but that makes no difference. Now, I want to answer another proposition. It is contended that the plea of the statute of limitations was a proper legal plea, and further it has been claimed here that such a plea raises a presumption of payment. That is not so at this time in the United States. It is not so held by any court of respectable jurisdiction in this country. Under the common law the period was a long one, not less than twenty-one years, and the English courts did hold that the lapse of such a long period, bringing a case under the statute of limitations, presupposed payment, but in this country the statute of limitations has not that effect. It is simply a statute of repose, by which the law says to the claimant, "You have lost your remedy by delay."

The courts everywhere deal with it in that way, holding it to be simply a statute of repose, carrying with it no presumption of payment. Now sir, it may be true that this company had the right to plead the statute; but if that be so, then it ought not to complain of this Congress when we exercise the right to invoke a statute of limitation against it, nor ask us to refrain from doing so unless it is willing to waive its plea and pay the debt which it owes this District. If a man undertakes to vindicate his rights in the courts he has to stand or fall by the law; but when a corporation comes in here and asks a mere gift as a matter of grace, asks this Congress to grant it an extension of time within which to do something which it is required by law to do, it ought to come with clean hands, and I will never consent to the passage of a bill of this kind until this company agrees to pay what it owes the District.

Mr. COGSWELL. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the District Committee I yielded a reluctant assent to the reporting of this bill; I yielded that assent because I thought some legislation was imperatively demanded in the interest of the public business. The bill was not fully satisfactory to me, and I reserved the right to vote for any amendments which might be offered to it. If this bill passes, in my judgment the result will be that the public will get the legislation and facilities which it requires, and this corporation will escape entirely and forever from the payment of any money that it now owes this District, if it does owe anything. In my judgment the saving clause in this bill which allows those proceedings for forfeiture now pending to go on is absolutely worthless, because I do not think that those proceedings are of any value at all. They are based upon an amendment to an appropriation bill passed in the Fifty-first Congress, an attempt to collect the debt which the court had said, in view of the statute of limitations, this company did not owe, and I do not believe that by legislation of the kind we can revive a judgment of the court below and compel the company to pay this money.

The saving clause in this bill provides that those proceedings for forfeiture may go on, but, as I have said, I regard that as wholly worthless, and for that reason I repeat that if this bill passes the result will be to give the public the legislation that is needed, but the company will escape from the payment of what it owes this District, if it owes the District anything. Now there is a fair contention, to put it mildly, that this road does owe the District a considerable sum of money. As has been stated several times in this debate, two courts have held that that sum was one hundred and forty-seven thousand and odd dollars. Those courts have so held on the merits of the case, and there has been no reversal of that judgment on the merits.

The Supreme Court, however, gave judgment for the road on the technical plea that the suit was barred by the statute of limitations. My own idea is that possibly—yes, probably—this company owes the District something, and a considerable amount; but it is a question so involved in matters of law and matters of fact and matters of ancient history that no committee of this body, with the time at its disposal for the consideration of these questions, can fairly consider and adjust and report upon the equities of the case and the amount which may justly be claimed; and it is much more difficult for this House to do it in the way that we discuss bills here. My own position in the committee was, as it is now in the House, that if this company owes the District a dollar it should pay every cent that it owes.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. If I may be recognized, I will yield my time to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. How much more time does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] wish?

Mr. COGSWELL. Ten minutes.

Mr. HEARD. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman, who is a member of the committee, have ten minutes additional.

There was no objection.

Mr. COGSWELL. My own position is that this company, if it owes the District of Columbia anything, should pay every dollar of its indebtedness. On the other hand if it does not owe the District a dollar, we should not take advantage of this opportunity to make the company pay a dollar.

Now, I understand there is to be submitted a proposition—it was originally suggested by the corporation itself—that jurisdiction be given to the new court of appeals to consider a case which shall be made up, leaving it to that court to determine whether this company owes the District anything and if anything how much, and that the amount found due by the court shall be paid by this company before this legislation takes effect.

Mr. HEARD. The plea of the statute of limitations being barred and there being filed also a written waiver of all rights accruing to the company by virtue of the judgment rendered heretofore.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does that also waive this question of notice?

Mr. COGSWELL. As I understand, it does. The amendment is in the hands of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], who changed in some respects the proposition as submitted by the company. Of course, the proposition ought to be as carefully drawn and as well guarded as possible. This was one of the original propositions of the road; but whether it were or not, it seems to me it is a fair way to solve this question. I do not see any reason why this company should not be given this additional legislation. I am opposed to forfeiting the charter of the company. There is scarcely ground for such action; and it seems to me it will be fair to the company and fair to the District if we give the new court of appeals jurisdiction to try these questions of fact and determine the case upon its merits, as was not done when the Supreme Court of the United States rendered a judgment in favor of the company upon the purely technical plea of the statute of limitations. That is my position in regard to this bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman say that proposition will be offered?

Mr. COGSWELL. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] showed me a while ago a proposition to that effect—similar to the one which was before the committee, but with some modifications added by himself. I understood him to say that this proposition would be offered as an amendment. If it should be adopted there ought to be no further opposition to the passage of this bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is substantially the amendment which my colleague supported in the committee.

Mr. COGSWELL. It is; but includes additional safeguards. If this amendment should be adopted there will be no need of the third section; and there will be no need of the amendment providing for the payment of the sum of $50,000. No one of us in this House knows whether $50,000 is within $90,000 or $30,000 or $10,000 of what this company ought to pay. It may be that the company ought not to pay anything. I confess that upon hearing the last statement, I thought there was strong merit in the argument of this road against the payment of this large amount; yet the fact stared me in the face that two courts of competent jurisdiction had declared the company liable. With such an amendment as the gentleman from Iowa proposes to offer, I think, as I have said, that the bill should pass without further objection.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. COGSWELL. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I have not heard all the discussion on this matter, and I wish information upon a few points, on which, no doubt, my colleague can answer me. As I understand, this company was required to abandon horse power and adopt a new system of propulsion. I would like to know whether it has been shown by the investigations of the committee that this company has acted in good faith in trying to comply with that requirement?

Mr. COGSWELL. I think the committee was unanimous in the belief that the company had made a fair explanation for their delay. They showed that they were obliged to adopt within a limited time one of three systems—the cable, the storage battery, or the underground electric system. They found, or thought they found, that there were mechanical objections to the adoption of the cable system.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. By reason of their meandering line?

Mr. COGSWELL. Yes, sir. They also thought at that time that the underground electric system was not sufficiently developed to warrant them in attempting it. So I think it may be fair to say that in good faith they took the remaining alternative—the storage-battery system.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Did they test it?

Mr. COGSWELL. They tested that system for two or three years, about three times as long, in my opinion, as they ought to have tested it, for they were about the only persons in this country who did not know that the storage-battery system up to this day was a dead failure. But all the same they took their money to the extent of about $400,000 and put it into that experiment. Not all of it is waste, because a great part of the expenditure can be used for other purposes. But it is a fact that they did expend something like $400,000 in experimenting with this storage system.

So I repeat to my friend from Iowa that I think I can say the committee were unanimous in believing that they offered a fairly reasonable explanation for their delay in not changing the motive power of the road. For one I am perfectly willing on their statement to acquit them.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I do not know when the time expires within which they must change the mode of propelling their cars; but I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if it is possible, in his opinion, to complete the change within the time required by the law?

Mr. MEREDITH. It is impossible.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. I ask if it is possible or impossible?

Mr. HEARD. The time has expired.

Mr. COGSWELL. The time is up. They are now in contempt of Congress.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Then another question: Was the corporation, and also the city, represented before the committee in respect to this question?

Mr. COGSWELL. Yes.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. And the committee looked into the matter thoroughly?

Mr. COGSWELL. We did, thoroughly, patiently, and at great length.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. Then, if I understand your position, you believe that the company acted in good faith, trying to comply with the law without being able to do so; that the time has expired without a compliance with it; that they ought to be given additional time, or time enough to allow them to supplement their past experiments with an experiment to determine the best mode of using the remaining systems of car propulsion, leaving the matter of any claim against the company in abeyance.

Mr. COGSWELL. That is about my position.

Mr. HENDERSON of Iowa. It seems to me to be a sound one.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Who will object to that?

Mr. COGSWELL. I do not know.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a suggestion to the gentleman reporting this measure, and that is that the bill be for the present withdrawn. Let it then come up two weeks from to-day, and in the meantime the parties interested could agree to a statement of facts which may be acceptable to both of them for the trial of this case. It must be evident to the company that they can not get the extension here, at least to-day, without something of the kind being done.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. What is the objection to the suggestion made by my colleague on the committee from Massachusetts?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not think it is possible for an amendment, that would be prepared by any person here not familiar with all the facts, to cover all the propositions that ought to be covered in an agreed statement of facts.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then allow this suggestion: The proposition my colleague [Mr. COGSWELL] has suggested was carefully drawn, and was discussed at least three, four, or five different times in the committee; it is full and complete and is in print. The gentleman can read it if he desires. What is the objection to that?

Mr. HEPBURN. A statement was made a little while ago that this company objected to a waiver of certain questions of notice. Now, I think that might be important. I do not know that it would be, but I want it waived for the reason that the gentleman who first appears in the list of incorporators, and who I understand was largely interested in this corporation, at the time was chairman of the board of public works of this District; that he had a divided interest in the matter, and without impugning him or anything of the kind, it may be that there has been a neglect on the part of some one to give such notice that a court may regard as important; and I want to guard all these points. It will not create any delay in the passage of the bill. It can be withdrawn now and properly prepared, to be presented on the next District day.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If my friend will permit me, the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. BAKER] stated that Mr. Shepherd was mentioned as an incorporator when this company was chartered in 1864——

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. And you must remember that it was seven or eight years after that that this legislation occurred when he was president of the board of public works.

Mr. HEPBURN. I am remembering it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee (continuing). Whether he was connected with the Metropolitan road then, nobody believes now. I do not know.

Mr. COGSWELL. I ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] if, at the next District day, we present an amendment which shall leave this to the court of appeals, sufficiently guarded, will that satisfy his opposition to the bill?

Mr. HEPBURN. So far as I am concerned, it will. If there can be an adjudication of the real merits of this matter——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Of the indebtedness?

Mr. HEPBURN. Of the indebtedness, without the interposition of any technical defense, for the want of notice or the statute of limitations, etc.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, I want to say, and if these gentlemen represent the opposition to this bill on the floor of the House——

Mr. HEPBURN. I merely represent myself.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If they make that proposition, I do not object to it, so far as I am concerned, as a member of this committee; because, if this road owes the District $147,000, they ought to be made to pay. We all concede that. But if we are to be met here on the next District day with the same kind of opposition—not from these gentlemen, but from other gentlemen—it seems to me that it would be hardly fair to ask that the bill go over now. If other gentlemen, on this side of the House particularly, will make the same agreement, I believe I am authorized to say for the committee that they will consent that the bill be laid aside until the next District day.

Mr. COGSWELL. Let that be the understanding.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. But if gentlemen have other objects in view, if it is intended to defeat all legislation on the subject, then it will do no good to let the matter go over. I, of course, do not intend to impugn the motives of anybody when I say this.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Mr. Speaker, before any kind of agreement is had to withdraw this bill to-day and present it two weeks from now, I want to call the attention of the House to another feature which has not as yet been discussed, at least not while I have been on the floor, and that is the proposition, as I understand it, from the reading of this bill, to extend for nearly three years the time in which this company are allowed to put on an electric motor.

Mr. COGSWELL. One year, on Ninth street.

Mr. WASHINGTON. And then two years more on the balance of the line.

Mr. HEARD. Does the gentleman think one year on the other part of the line will be sufficient?

Mr. WASHINGTON. Nearly two years ago this same company came into this House and asked an extension of one year in order to be allowed to change from its present horse power to the storage-battery system. I predicted then that they would only waste their money and their time, and they would not get rapid transit, but that at the end of that extension they would come and ask another year for the same purpose.

Now, I do not claim to be a prophet, but my words have proved absolutely true; and now, more than two years afterwards, they ask a further extension. They ask for three years more in which to disgrace the capital of the United States by running a horse car line from this Capitol to the most populous and improved parts of the city.

Now, I say that when this bill is withdrawn it should come back here with an amendment, allowing the Metropolitan road, if you please, the underground system of electric propulsion; I have no objection to that for one, but we ought not to give them more than one year in which to apply it. They can do it just as well in twelve months as they can do it in twelve years. The entire Washington and Georgetown system was cabled in a little over twelve months.

I am not an electrical engineer nor an expert in the propulsion of street cars, but I believe that the Metropolitan system could have applied a cable to their road if they had earnestly desired to do so; but instead of that they preferred to experiment with a storage battery, which all the world knew was a failure, save and except the directory of that road. They experimented with it for nearly three years. They threw away the money of their stockholders, and they fooled with the Congress of the United States. Now it is time to make them put on the proper system of propulsion.

I believe that the underground system is practicable. I have believed it for two years, and it is not open to the objections which have been urged to the overhead trolley, which I then said could be used for two years or eighteen months, and then taken away without detriment to anybody. But I insist that it is an outrage on the traveling public of this District to allow this street-car company three years longer in which to put a little electrical appliance on a railroad not more than 3 or 4 miles long.

A MEMBER. The combined mileage is greater than that.

Mr. WASHINGTON. Take your combined mileage, and how long is it?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. About 8 miles.

Mr. WASHINGTON. How long is the road from here to Georgetown? Not over 3 miles, and twice 3 miles are 6 miles; and up and down Ninth street it may be 3 or 4 miles. But whether it be 3 miles or 30 miles, a corporation of that size, and certainly with its command of capital, can put in an underground system in less than three years.

Mr. ALLEN. Coxy's army will be here next month. [Laughter.]

Mr. WASHINGTON. And we want to get it out of the city as rapidly as possible.

Now, when this bill is withdrawn I hope it will be with the understanding that there will be an amendment presented by the committee and offered to this House cutting down the time from three years to twelve months. I want to see this line prosper just as well as the Avenue car line prospers. We ought to have some such system applied to all the car lines in the District. There is not a city of the size of Washington to-day that is cursed with so abominable a system of slow horse street cars as this city, and there is no place where the time is a greater object to those who are compelled to use those cars. Now, if this bill is to be withdrawn, let it be withdrawn with a perfect understanding that I for one, like my friend from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], do not desire to see the company pay a dollar into the District treasury unless it properly and justly owes it to the District, but if it does owe it to the District of Columbia, then it ought to be made to pay to the uttermost farthing. And, also like my friend from Mississippi, I believe that the best tribunal to try that question is a court, like the court of appeals of this District, and not a committee of this House, and not the House in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. ALLEN. As I have had some connection with the opposition to this bill, so far as any agreement on my part is concerned, I want to state that before any more legislation favorable to this road is granted it should do justice to the District of Columbia; and I am going to be the judge of that when the proposition comes in. I think we can come nearer arriving at a proper conclusion as to that when the committee meets again than we can to-day. I do not think there is any probability of this bill passing this evening; and therefore I think it would be a good suggestion to lay it aside.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I only want to say one word. Gentlemen have stated the grounds upon which they are willing that this bill should go over.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I desire to interrupt the gentleman there.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. And as I understand, it is agreed to on the ground contained in the proposition submitted by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL], who is a member of the committee.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I want to interrupt the gentleman only for the purpose of not having you mislead yourself. So far as my opposition is concerned, whether it would cease would depend upon the character of the amendment offered to the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. What would satisfy the gentleman?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I do not know that I am prepared to state what would exactly meet my views, but I will state in a few words what I think about the matter. I am unalterably opposed to Congress dealing with these matters seriatim, corporation by corporation. I believe that that is a corrupt and wrong principle, but I also believe in recommitting this bill to the committee with instructions that they shall bring into the House a general bill—applicable to all the street railroad companies seeking a new franchise or an increase of franchise or an extension of franchise, or any further benefit from the public—providing that such privilege shall be granted, such further franchise extended after being put up at public auction and sold to the highest bidder, to that one who will pay the largest percentage of the gross receipts to the District of Columbia. I am unalterably opposed to giving away public property, and I am opposed to this bill for that reason among others.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman's position is based upon a reasonable ground; but I want to say——

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I only said that because I do not want you to understand that I had agreed to anything.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There is already a bill pending in the Senate which has in view the ascertainment of and providing for all the equities of the United States, if there be any, and of the District of Columbia as against these corporations. There is a general bill like that pending at the other end, and it seems to me that the gentleman will find it utterly impracticable to apply such a general bill, with these general provisions, to this individual case, and I submit to my friend that if this bill passes and this additional time be given this road, that the general bill which he speaks of will cover every point that he has mentioned, and will apply to this the same as to all other railroads.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. It would apply to this railroad only after this extension had been granted and after it had gained a new vested right. I am willing that any bill which is produced here shall do nothing but what is just and right; and that a bill shall contain provisions for safeguarding the interests and the equities you want to protect. I am willing that a bill shall be introduced regulating all. I want a bill regulating this particular corporation and the balance of the railroads corporations exercising valuable franchises; and we can not do that if we pass this bill, which would be discriminating in favor of this corporation, because it is asking substantially a new franchise in the way of an extension or an increase in the time. That would be unjust to the other roads involved in the general bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I would remind my friend from Mississippi that in every single charter that has heretofore been granted, in every charter which is upon the statute books of the United States granting franchises to these railroads, the express right is reserved to alter, to modify, and change them, or to repeal them.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understand that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Congress has plenary power over them.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understand that, and I understand, on the other hand, that although Congress would have power to come in after this bill was passed and repeal this very charter, yet, as a matter of human nature and as a matter of fact, Congress would not do it. The gentleman knows that as well as I. And Congress would be right in not doing so, because it would see that after having vested these people with certain privileges upon certain conditions it would be wrong now to divest them of those privileges. Therefore I would have the law to apply to as many corporations as possible, and this being one of the chiefest, as St. Paul says, I would frame it so as to apply to this corporation.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, in view of all that has been said, I ask that this bill be laid aside until the next District day.

Mr. SIBLEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to explain briefly why I am found in the ranks of the opposition to this measure. I have examined the question without prejudice, and it seems to me that this is very clearly a case wherein we can exercise a vast amount of caution with great benefit to the public interest. There is something in average human nature which revolts at the idea of a great corporation being permitted to willfully defy the opinion of the public, the decrees of Congress, and the judgment of the courts, and I hold that the plea of the statute of limitation is one of the weakest pleas ever interposed in any just cause.

If there was $147,000 due to this District—and two courts have found such to be the fact upon a trial of the cause upon its merits—that raises presumption enough in my mind that the claim was a just one; and further, this corporation dared not appeal to the higher court upon alleged errors of fact or of law, but were constrained to go to the Supreme Court pleading the baby act—the statute of limitations. Under this liability of $147,000, with, as I understand, eleven years' interest, there is a vast fund coming to this District. I am not anxious or willing to see this Congress step in and divest these people of any rights or any equities they may possess, but it is a matter of notoriety within the knowledge of every member of this House that the rights to the streets now occupied by this railway company are immensely valuable.

If they would take away their rails and their cars, and the franchise was placed at public auction, it would be worth at least a half a million dollars. The city of Buffalo put up at public auction in the way that is suggested by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] a franchise inferior to this, and the traction companies bid 14 per cent of the gross receipts.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. As high as 43 per cent has been bid in New York.

Mr. SIBLEY. Yes. But the lamentable fact in the Buffalo case is, that although those people did offer 14 per cent of the gross receipts, competing with legitimate bidders, when it came to settling the matter they went to the city council and got the franchise, paying practically nothing for it. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think this bill had better go over, and if this company comes here and asks for a valuable franchise, or for the extension of a valuable franchise, let them first show their confidence in the justice of Congress by paying into the hands of the courts the amount of the judgment which the District obtained against them. When they have done that, they can come here with better grace and ask for this extension. Let the matter be settled in any form that will protect the interests of the people of this District, but let this company not come in here and plead the statute of limitations as a ground for condoning their past misdoings. I shall oppose this measure in its present form.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have read for information the amendment I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read for information, as follows:

Add at the end the following: "Provided, however, That this act shall not take effect until the said company shall have paid into the Treasury of the United States the assessment of $147,000, made against it by authority of the District of Columbia for street improvements, the said sum to be placed to the credit of said District."

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to have an amendment read for information.

The amendment was read for information, as follows:

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi moves to recommit with instructions to report a general bill applicable to all street-railway corporations seeking franchises, renewal of franchises, extensions of franchises, increase of franchises, or amendment of charters, providing for the sale at public caution for terms of years, to the highest bidders, after due advertisement, of all such street-railway franchises to be hereafter exercised within the District, subject to provisions for existing equities.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, if on next District day we are to have the same fight that we have had here to-day, what is the use of having this matter laid over? I do not understand that gentlemen who have been antagonizing the bill express themselves as satisfied with the substitute proposed by my colleague on the committee [Mr. COGSWELL]. I understand that some gentlemen do, but a number of other gentlemen do not, and I now ask them what will satisfy them? If nothing will be satisfactory, we ought to know it at this time.

Mr. ABBOTT. I will say to the gentleman that I will be satisfied when the company pay the money that they owe the District.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Are you willing for the court of appeals to ascertain what the amount is?

Mr. ABBOTT. I am.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, if other gentlemen agree to that we can arrange this without difficulty.

Mr. HUDSON. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. Do the committee think they can offer an amendment to this bill that will be legally binding upon the company?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will state in reply to my friend's question that the company agreed to this in the presence of the whole District committee. They agreed to the very proposition which my colleague on the committee [Mr. COGSWELL] has suggested; they were perfectly willing to agree to a reference of the controversy to the court of appeals for any sort of investigation, promising to abide by the judgment of the court on the merits, withdrawing the plea of the statute of limitations.

Mr. HUDSON. That is not my question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I understood the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SIBLEY] to take the position that if the plea of the statute of limitations (which is odious to him) be waived, and if the case be tried by the court of appeals upon its merits, that will be satisfactory to him. I would like to know whether that is his position?

Mr. SIBLEY. If the company will deposit the money, subject to the decision of the court.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Oh, the company is solvent.

Mr. SIBLEY. So is the Government.

Mr. HEARD. I wish to say a few words for the benefit more especially of my friend from Kansas [Mr. HUDSON]. When this matter was before the committee an amendment was presented which has been read here to-day providing in substance for sending this matter to the court of appeals for trial upon the record, barring the plea of the statute of limitations. Under this amendment the company is to go into court and waive all rights under the judgment rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States; in addition to that they are to consent in court to the jurisdiction so that there may be no question about the authority of the court to render judgment for or against them on the record.

Mr. HUDSON. And if the plea of the statute of limitations is interposed, it is not to avail?

Mr. HEARD. There will be no difficulty on that ground; the condition in regard to the waiver of the plea of the statute of limitations is to be put into the bill.

Mr. HUDSON. In the gentleman's judgment, can we legally bind the railroad company, even if they agree to it?

Mr. HEARD. I have no question on the earth that if they file such an agreement as I have referred to, an agreement waiving their rights under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, withdrawing their plea of the statute of limitations, and binding themselves further to consent to the jurisdiction of the court and acknowledge the binding force of the judgment to be rendered, such an agreement would be effectual to bind the company.

Mr. HUDSON. I have no captious objection to permitting this company to operate its road. On the other hand, I want it understood that I am willing to consent—and will not consent unless the majority be against me—to a further extension of time in behalf of this company unless they pay what they justly and equitably owe this District or the United States.

Mr. HEARD. I will say to the gentleman from Kansas that his position is not different, I hope, from that of every member of the committee.

Mr. HUDSON. I hope not.

Mr. HEARD. The difficulty, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] has aptly said, is that no member of the committee and no member of the House can tell at present how much this company does equitably owe. Therefore, I was not in favor of reporting from the committee of the proposition allowing the company to pay $50,000. As I have already stated, if such a proposition had been presented by us, captious critics would say that we were offering to accept from this company less than it was right they should pay. On the other hand, we were unwilling to recommend the amount insisted on by the Commissioners, because we did not believe the company owed so much.

If the case be referred to the court of appeals under the arrangement suggested, the company binding themselves to accept the decision of the court, we can ascertain just what this company should pay; and no man should stand before this House or anywhere else and ask that the company should be permitted to pay any less amount than would thus be adjudged against it.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. But why should we stand here upon this new proposition when two courts have already decided the question?

Mr. COOMBS. And why should the interests of the District be put in peril by another adjudication?

Mr. HEARD. The gentleman from Alabama has shown, as I think, very clearly and satisfactorily that in the trial had before the supreme court of the District, the discretion of the jury on material points was instructed away; and I believe that if the case had been reviewed by the Supreme Court of the United States upon the eight meritorious pleas instead of the two pleas of the statute of limitations, the judgment of the court below would have been overruled on said pleas to the merit, as it was in the two pleas considered.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Why did not the company try it on those meritorious pleas?

Mr. HEARD. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], who is a lawyer, knows that when the case went to the Supreme Court it was the duty of the court to first consider those pleas of the statute of limitations, because if they were sustained the court would not have jurisdiction to render judgment upon the other pleas.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I understand that.

Mr. HEARD. Now, the gentleman asks me why the case was not tried upon those meritorious pleas. The reason was this: The company insisted that the judgment in the court below was for an exorbitant amount, which it did not owe, and therefore took advantage of this plea of the statute of limitations.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. The gentleman did not understand me. I was criticising not the court but the railroad company for not submitting the case upon the meritorious pleas.

Mr. HEARD. I ask the gentleman whether he would not have done the same if he felt that the judgment was oppressive?

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Undoubtedly, whether I thought the judgment oppressive or not, if I had been a railroad company I would have interposed any plea that I considered might be effectual.

Mr. HUDSON. Is it not true that the Supreme Court, in passing upon the decision of the lower court, does not attempt to criticise any other portion of the decision?

Mr. HEARD. There was no opportunity for the Supreme Court of the United States to pass upon any other question. The pleas of the statute of limitations being sustained there was nothing left for the court to act upon.

Mr. HUDSON. The gentleman does not answer my question. I say is it not a fact that this company had a right to raise any other question that was at issue in the lower court——

Mr. ABBOTT. Judge Bradley, in rendering the decision of the Supreme Court in this case, said that the case was tried on its merits on the issues presented on the other pleas.

Mr. HEARD. Certainly, but it does not affirm the correctness of the judgment below, but overruled the lower court on the pleas considered. It overruled the decision as to the plea of the statute of limitations, and thereby nullified the judgment of the court below.

Mr. ABBOTT. But the point is that it was tried also on the merits in the court below.

Mr. HEARD. And as Judge COBB of Alabama insists, and justly in my opinion, the case was killed below by the instructions of the court, and the case was not properly tried on its merits——

Mr. ABBOTT. The Supreme Court says it was.

Mr. HEARD (continuing)—and was not correctly or justly disposed of under the instructions of the court below.

Mr. ABBOTT. There is a difference of opinion about that. The Supreme Court says that it was tried on its merits.

Mr. HEARD. Of course, this is a matter of history, and there need be no question about it.

Mr. HUDSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri this question: Is it not true that the railroad company had the right to go to the Supreme Court of the United States on every question submitted to the court below?

Mr. HEARD. Not after the plea of the statute of limitations was sustained. The sustaining of that plea determined the whole question.

Mr. HUDSON. The gentleman does not understand me. I ask if the company did not have the right to go to the Supreme Court and ask a ruling on every question submitted to the court below?

Mr. HEARD. In answer to my friend I will say that no lawyer ever saw such a proceeding in the Supreme Court.

Mr. HUDSON. The gentleman evidently does not get my question correctly.

Mr. HEARD (continuing). Because if they ruled against the company, and for the city on all the other pleas, and then for the company on the two pleas of the statute of limitations, of course the case would be thrown out of court.

Mr. HUDSON. I understand that, but I wish the gentleman would answer the question in the form I put it: whether it is not a fact that the company had a right to raise any question at issue in the lower court, and that they did not raise any question except on the statute of limitations?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SIBLEY. I hope the time of the gentleman will be extended.

Mr. HEARD. I do not care to submit anything further, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I now renew the proposition that I made a short time ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the suggestion of the gentleman?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I propose to withdraw this bill from consideration to-day, to be called up again on the next District day, two weeks from now, with the understanding that in the mean time the Committee on the District of Columbia will mature as fully as it can and as carefully as possible the substitute or amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COGSWELL] to refer the whole question at issue to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, the railroad company to waive any benefit that it may have by reason of the statute of limitations in the pending case; and that the question be there tried by the court of appeals on its merits.

We propose to draw an amendment in the general form I have stated, with the understanding that it is acceptable to gentlemen; at least to those who have said so on the floor of the House, and we hope it will be acceptable to all others. Of course gentlemen who have not said so will not be bound by the agreement.

I withdraw the bill, then, with that understanding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of objection, the bill will be withdrawn.

There was no objection, and the bill was withdrawn.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 112) to provide for a survey for a bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. 1917) authorizing the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company to bridge the Sulphur River, in the State of Arkansas or in the State of Texas.

A bill (H. R. 5041) to extend the time authorizing the St. Louis and Birmingham Railroad to build a bridge across Tennessee River at Clifton, Tenn.

A bill (H. R. 5356) to authorize the West Braddock Bridge Company to construct a bridge over the Monongahela River from the borough of Rankin to Mifflin Township.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 1757) to provide for the sale of the old custom-house building in the city of Erie, Pa., in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

GAMBLING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEARD. I now call up for consideration the bill H. R. 6109, to amend an act approved January 31, 1883, entitled "An act to more effectually suppress gambling in the District of Columbia."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of the act of Congress approved the 31st day of January, 1883, entitled "An act to more effectually suppress gambling in the District of Columbia," shall not apply to bookmaking at the spring and fall meetings of any jockey club or other racing association conducted beyond 1 mile from the limits of the cities of Washington and Georgetown. Provided, however, That such meetings occur between the 1st day of March and the 15th day of December, and do not exceed the period of eighteen days each.

The Committee on the District of Columbia recommend the following amendment:

Insert after the word "beyond" in line eight, the words, "three-fourths of."

Mr. BURROWS. This, I understand, is a bill to authorize gambling at horse races?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is a bill amending the bill for the suppression of gambling.

Mr. BURROWS. Is not that the object? The title is very shrewdly drawn.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not know about that. I did not draw it. It is drawn by the Commissioners of the District.

Mr. BURROWS. I will say now that you need not spend any time with that bill, for it will not pass to-day.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is drawn by the District Commissioners and recommended by them.

Mr. BURROWS. Well, I am sorry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman withdraw the bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I suppose the gentleman understands that the bill simply authorizes horse racing at Bennings and at Ivy City?

Mr. BURROWS. Horse races and betting and gambling.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I think they ought to have the right to run horses if they wish. I never go to races myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURROWS. I have no objection to debating the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not care to debate it at all. I have never been to the races at Bennings or at Ivy City. I do not attend them, but here is a bill reported unanimously from the committee, I believe, drawn and recommended by the District Commissioners, and it simply authorizes that which is authorized, I believe, in the State of Michigan. I know it is in the State of Tennessee, and I believe in every other State of the Union. If there is a State in the Union that prohibits horse racing on regular tracks, I do not know it. This simply provides that horses shall be run, as in all the States, and it locates it three-quarters of a mile from the District line in order to limit it to the two places, Bennings and Ivy City, as I understand it.

Mr. BURROWS. What did the original statute do, which this seeks to amend?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I am not prepared to say.

Mr. BURROWS. It prohibited certain things, did it not?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No; they have had racing all the time, but there has been some decision, I believe. I am not informed about it. I understood that there has been some decision of the courts in some way affecting the question of horse racing, and this statute was deemed necessary in order to obviate that decision of the court, whatever it was.

Mr. BURROWS. What was that decision?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I am not prepared to say.

Mr. COOMBS. I suggest that the gentleman withdraw the bill until he has further information about it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will answer it if I can; but I hope some of those gentlemen who are horse racers will do it. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. The distinguishing provision of this bill is to make it lawful to bet on horse racing at certain times as I understand. At what special time is it to be lawful to bet, and at what special times criminal to bet on horse racing?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It provides for racing during the spring and fall, two meetings a year.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It actually proposes to legalize betting. That is the effect of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Have you no race tracks in Ohio? I do not think this is any different from the laws of the other States.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Does it provide for recovering the money when the pool seller does not happen to have it? Does it provide for any lien on the property?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Does your law in Ohio provide that?

Mr. GROSVENOR. No.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. This does not either, in my opinion.

Mr. BURROWS. Let us vote.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] has stated positively that the bill can not pass this evening.

Mr. BURROWS. We can tell by voting.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Because we have no quorum, and if that is true——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman withdraw the bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. No, I do not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question, then, is on the amendment reported by the committee.

The question was taken on the amendment, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HEPBURN. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 18, noes 1.

Accordingly, the amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CARUTH. Division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 27.

Mr. BURROWS. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will appoint as tellers the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BURROWS] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON].

Pending the division,

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee said: Mr. Speaker, I withdraw this bill from consideration, and the gentleman from Michigan withdraws the point of no quorum.

HARBOR REGULATIONS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 5443) to establish harbor regulations for the District of Columbia. This is a bill which has been drawn by the District Commissioners and sent to the House with the request that it be introduced. It was introduced by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. ALDERSON].

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That every vessel coming to anchor in the Potomac River between the junction of the Washington and Georgetown channels of said river and the extension of the south line of P street southwest, in the city of Washington, shall anchor as near the flats in said river as possible, so that the channel of said river will not be obstructed; and if such vessel is to remain over twelve hours it shall be moored with both anchors, so as to give room for passing vessels and so as not to swing and obstruct said channel.

No vessel shall be permitted to anchor in the Washington channel of the Potomac River between the extended lines of P or K street south. Vessels coming to anchor above the lines of K street south aforesaid shall come to anchor as near the flats as possible and so that the channel will not be obstructed; and all vessels coming to anchor shall be so moored by the use of both anchors as to prevent obstruction of the channel within 400 feet of the nearest wharf, the said anchorage to continue only twenty-four hours, unless otherwise ordered or directed by the harbor master.

No vessel shall be permitted to lie in Seventeenth street canal, New Jersey avenue canal, or James Creek canal, or at the entrance thereof, so as to obstruct the passage of any vessel going into or out of the same or moving from one place to another therein, unless such obstructing vessel is actually engaged in loading or unloading, and shall then, if deemed expedient by the harbor master, be removed to such place as shall be necessary to give room to passing vessels. Any captain or owner of, or anyone in charge of, any barge, sand scow, or any vessel that may sink in said canals shall raise and remove the same in five days.

Any vessels at the end of wharves or in docks shall, when required by the harbor master, haul either way to accommodate vessels going in or coming out from such wharves or docks. They shall not occupy regular steamers' or sailing packets' berths without permission from the recognized occupants of such wharves and docks. And they are required to rig in all fore and aft spars, have boats hoisted up under the bow, and davits turned up, as the harbor master may direct.

Vessels, when not engaged in loading or discharging cargo, shall give place to such vessels as are ready to receive or deliver freights. And if the captain or person in charge of any vessel refuse to move said vessel when notified by the occupant of the wharf at which she is lying, the harbor master shall order him to haul to some other berth or into the stream.

The powers and authority herein conferred upon the harbor master may, in his absence or temporary disability, be exercised by the pilot of the harbor police boat.

Any person refusing to obey the instructions of the harbor master, or, in case of his absence or temporary disability, the said pilot of the harbor police boat, or any person failing to comply with any of the provisions of this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof in the police court of the District of Columbia shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $100, or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or by both such punishments, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. HEARD. I ask that the report, containing a letter from the Commissioners, be read. It is very short.

The report (by Mr. HEARD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5443) to establish harbor regulations for the District of Columbia, report the same back with recommendation that the bill do pass.

OFFICE COMMISSIONERS DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, January 24, 1894.

DEAR SIR: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia have the honor to submit herewith a draft of a bill entitled "A bill to establish harbor regulations for the District of Columbia," and recommend its early enactment. The present laws on the subject are too meager to give the harbor master power to regulate movements of vessels in the harbor for the due protection of the public and private interests involved. The regulations contemplated by this bill are substantially those that prevail in nearly every port of entry in the United States.

Very respectfully,

JOHN W. ROSS,
President Board of Commissioners District of Columbia.

Hon. JOHN T. HEARD,
Chairman Committee on the District of Columbia,
House of Representatives.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, there is no amendment to the bill, and I desire to say just a few words. The Commissioners report that the District laws are not sufficiently strong to enable the harbor master properly to protect life and property in the harbor. The harbor master himself was before our committee and explained the bill fully to us, and in such a manner that our committee was convinced of the absolute necessity for the adoption of the amendment to the law which is embodied in this bill. It is especially important that during the summer season, when there are so many excursion boats running, and when there is so much risk of loss of life and property, that the harbor master shall be furnished with sufficient authority to insure their protection. I hope the bill will pass without opposition.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HEARD, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ILLUMINATING GAS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the next bill on the Calendar, which is the bill (H. R. 4279) relating to the sale of gas in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Washington Gaslight Company is authorized to charge and collect, after the passage of this act, for illuminating gas furnished to and paid for by the Government of the United States and other consumers in the District of Columbia, at the rate of $1 per thousand cubic feet: Provided, That if consumers other than the Government shall not pay monthly any gas bill within ten days after the same shall have been presented said company may charge and collect from said consumer so failing to pay said bill as aforesaid $1.25 per thousand cubic feet for the gas furnished to said consumer during said month.

The first amendment was read:

In line 7 of section 1, after the word "of," insert the words, "not exceeding."

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I wish to offer an amendment or two to this bill. I suppose this is just the first reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There are the amendments of the committee that have not yet been reported. The Clerk will first report the amendments of the committee.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The amendment I wish to offer is to the first section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will have an opportunity to offer his amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill appears to be on the House Calendar; but it should be considered in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Without objection, it will be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HEARD. The point was not raised.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands the gentleman from Ohio to say that he has an amendment to the first section.

Mr. HEARD. I ask that the committee amendment be first disposed of.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend in line 7 by inserting the words "not exceeding;" so as to read: "At a rate of not exceeding $1 per thousand."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, this amendment will be considered as agreed to. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair would suggest that the gentleman from Ohio now offer his amendment to the first section.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I am prepared to offer my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "company" in line 3, the words "And all other gaslight companies doing business in the District of Columbia;" so as to read: "That the Washington Gaslight Company, and all other gaslight companies doing business in the District of Columbia."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, this amendment will be considered as agreed to.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. COFFEEN. Mr. Speaker, before we leave that section, I notice that it is necessary, to make it grammatically accurate, that the word "is" should be changed to "are."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the amendment?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Oh, certainly. I desire it to be grammatically correct.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the grammatical construction will be improved in the direction suggested by the gentleman from Wyoming.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the other committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after section 1 the following additional sections:

"SEC. 2. That section 1 of an act entitled 'An act regulating gas works,' approved June 23, 1874, is amended so as to read as follows: 'That from and after the 30th day of June, 1874, the illuminating power of the gas furnished by any gaslight company, person, or persons in the District of Columbia shall be equal to sixteen candles by the Bunsen photometer, using the English parliamentary standard Argand burner, having fifteen holes and a 7-inch chimney, consuming 5 cubic feet of gas per hour; and such gas shall not contain more than 30 grains of sulphur in any form in 100 cubic feet, nor more than 5 grains of ammonia in any form in 100 cubic feet, and shall be free of the impurity known as sulphureted hydrogen, said impurity to be determined by passing the gas through a glass vessel containing strips of bibulous paper moistened with a solution of the acetate of lead, and if any discoloration of the test paper is found to have taken place, this is to be held conclusive as to the presence of sulphureted hydrogen in the gas. When the illuminating gas supplied by any company, person or persons in the District of Columbia shall at any one time be of less illuminating power or of less purity than according to the standard just heretofore given, it shall be so reported by the inspector of gas and meters to the company, person, or persons supplying the same, who shall be subject to a penalty of $100, to be recovered before the proper tribunal and paid into the treasury of the District of Columbia aforesaid for each and every day during which such violation shall continue: Provided, however, That if it shall appear that such deviation from the above-named standards could not have been prevented by ordinary care and prudence, but was occasioned by some unavoidable cause, then the said penalty shall not be enforced.'

"SEC. 3. That any gas company or person placing a gas meter in service in the District of Columbia that has not been inspected, proved, and sealed, as provided for by the act of March 3, 1873, entitled 'An act making appropriations for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes,' for each and every such violation of said act shall be subject to a penalty of $100, to be recovered before the proper tribunal of the District of Columbia.

"SEC. 4. That a clerk shall be appointed by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to perform clerical services and assist generally in the work required in the laboratories of the inspector of gas and meters, and his compensation shall be $1,000 per annum. That an additional inspector of lamps shall be appointed by said Commissioners, and his compensation shall be $900 per annum."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Sections 2, 3, and 4 are all amendments, and have just been reported. Without objection, the second section will be considered as agreed to. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I desire to offer an amendment to it.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 7, in section 2, strike out "sixteen," and insert "twenty-two," so as to read:

"The illuminating power of the gas furnished by any gaslight company, person, or persons in the District of Columbia shall be equal to 22 candles by the Bunsen photometer."

Mr. OUTHWAITE. My reason for offering that amendment is this——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as agreed to.

Mr. HEARD. I want to hear the explanation of the gentleman.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The explanation of my amendment is this: The gas company has been furnishing us, that is, the people of the District of Columbia, of whom I am one, with gas which measured according to this measure, and according to their statement averages about 17 candle power. Now, we are paying for 17 candle power, and I have never seen a week, or six days in succession, in which the light was sufficient to read by; and I think that by making a little higher requirement as to the candle power we will get gas that we can use and gas that will be satisfactory to the people.

I have not complained about the price fixed in this bill. It is $1 per thousand feet. I saw it stated in the Scientific American some official connected with the manufacture of the gas furnished in Boston had recently said that the actual cost of that gas, with the cost of distribution added, amounted to 60 cents per thousand feet. I believe that this company can make a very nice profit at a dollar a thousand, and furnish us with a better quality af gas, gas with more illuminating power than we now get.

Mr. MILLIKEN. How many candle power did the gentleman say this Washington gas represented?

Mr. OUTHWAITE. It is said to average about 17 candle power.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I should say that the gas furnished where I board is about 3 candle power, or 2½. [Laughter.]

Mr. OUTHWAITE. If the gentleman desires to increase the requirement up to 24 candle power, I will accept that amendment.

Mr. CARUTH. Do I understand the gentleman from Maine to say that he has to use a candle to see the gas? [Laughter.]

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, after a careful examination of the question of the cost of making gas, and the operation of this company, the committee concluded and reported to the House that they believed it to be practicable for the company to furnish gas of the quality which they now furnish, at $1 per thousand feet. I feel it my duty to say that the majority of the committee, and I think the entire committee, believe that this is as cheap as the company can furnish gas of the present quality.

Now, if we are going to raise the standard to so great an extent as the gentleman from Ohio proposes, that necessarily increases the cost of the manufacture, and I feel it my duty to say here that I do not believe it will be fair or just to the company. I believe that the regulation proposed in this bill, reducing the present price 20 per cent, bringing it down to a dollar per thousand feet, is as great a reduction as, in justice to all parties concerned, the committee can recommend or as the House ought to adopt. It is only just to the company to say that according to the statement submitted by Dr. Ford, the Government gas inspector, and by other witnesses, Mr. Lansden, Mr. Dickson, and Mr. Dodge, the quality of the gas furnished in this city is at least equal to the average of the gas furnished in other cities. The statement of Mr. Lansden, who is an expert in the business, who has had charge of making gas in this city, in St. Louis, and elsewhere, is that if the company reduces the price to $1 a thousand, and furnishes as good gas as it now supplies, there will be no reasonable ground for complaint, and I believe that is true.

The Government inspector, Dr. Ford, is an officer appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and he gives an official bond in double the amount of his salary. He impressed the committee as being a perfectly fair and intelligent witness, and his statement was, and the concurrence of testimony was, that a large majority of the complaints about the gas were due to local obstructions in the pipes, and not to the quality of the gas where there was a sufficient supply. Dr. Ford also states that in his opinion at least one-fourth of the cases of complaint are due to defective burners. I think the evidence before the committee justifies the statement which is contained in the committee's report, that the quality of gas furnished in this city is reasonably good, and, according to the testimony of these witnesses, is as good as the average gas furnished in other cities, and that when the price is reduced, as it will be if this bill becomes a law, to $1 per thousand feet, it will then be lower than the price at which an equal quality of gas is furnished in other cities of the country, with three or four exceptions.

I believe, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that it would be unjust to compel the company to reduce the price of their gas to this extent, and at the same time to raise the quality up to 22 candle power from 16 candle power, which the law now requires. The gentleman from Ohio says it is in evidence that the gas now furnished equals 17 candle power. That is true. The statement of Dr. Ford shows that it has averaged for about two years 18 candle power; but when you fix the standard as high as 22, four points above 18, which is the present maximum, and attach a penalty to the failure to supply that quality, then you are likely to largely increase the cost of manufacture, and I think that as a matter of justice to the company and to the public, who, in my judgment, will be satisfied with gas of the present quality at a dollar per 1,000 feet, we ought not to adopt the amendment, but ought to be content with the maintenance of the present quality and the reduction of price which the committee recommends.

Mr. HEPBURN. What is the value of the stock of this company now?

Mr. HEARD. The quotations, I think, are about $46.50 a share. The par value is $20 a share.

Mr. HEPBURN. Supposing the par 100, that is equivalent to nearly 300.

Mr. HEARD. Oh, no; over 200, but less than 250.

Mr. HEPBURN. What dividend did the company pay last year?

Mr. HEARD. I can not give the gentleman the figures, but if he will send to the document room and get the report made by the committee accompanying this bill it will give him all these details.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does that report show the entire payments by the stockholders into this company?

Mr. HEARD. I think it does. It was intended to be absolutely complete upon that point.

Mr. HEPBURN. The amount paid in is about $100,000, is it not?

Mr. HEARD. More than that.

Mr. HEPBURN. I believe the entire amount paid in in cash by the stockholders is something over $100,000, and that all the betterments have been made out of the earnings of the company.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman is mistaken. He will find that at one time when the stock was increased the stockholders paid in $500,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. In cash?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes, sir, in cash; that is what the officers of the company state.

Mr. HEARD. I do not need to state (for the observation of every member here makes the statement unnecessary) that it is a very thankless task for a member of a committee to rise here and make a statement (even when such a statement is necessary as one of the duties of his position) where the interests of any corporation are supposed to conflict with those of the general public, and he feels obliged to defend the interests of such corporation. I hope I need not say that the committee tried to make, and did make, a full and fair investigation of this subject. I believe that members who may examine the report made by the committee will be satisfied by the efforts which we made in that direction. The report states our belief that to reduce the price of gas 20 per cent—that is to $1 per thousand feet—and require the gas to be equal to that which is now furnished, is as far as we can properly and justly go in that direction at this time.

Mr. COOMBS. What is the present price?

Mr. BABCOCK. One dollar and twenty-five cents.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Mr. Speaker, I have not had, as my friend from Missouri [Mr. HEARD] has had, an opportunity to investigate the details of this subject in committee, but I believe we should not cut down the price to be paid for this gas if at the same time we are going to reduce the quality. I do not know whether the trouble is in the obstruction of the burners or in the quality of the gas itself; but judging by the amount of light actually produced, I think my friend from Missouri has stated the candle-power of this gas quite as high as it is entitled to be stated.

Of course, considering the amount of the material produced in this House, gas ought to be pretty cheap in the city of Washington.

Several MEMBERS. "Oh, no!"

Mr. MILLIKEN. But at the same time I believe it would be better for us to pay a fair price for an article of good quality and have gaslight that we can see by, rather than reduce the amount paid and have lights which are such only in name.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that we, as a Congress, should provide good light for this city. Here is where members of Congress get light; and judging from the effect which we see all over this country from the legislation of this Congress since our sessions commenced, I believe that if there is anybody on God's footstool that needs light it is the American Congress; and I believe the people will vote to pay all the money that may be necessary to give light to this House and to the other.

Mr. BABCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to refer in a few words to the testimony taken by the committee in reference to the quality of the gas furnished in this city. Numerous complaints had been made to the Commissioners, to the gas company, and to the committee on the subject; but investigation showed that in nearly all cases the fault was either in the supply pipe or in the burner. I can speak from experience in my own house, where on some of the fixtures there are new burners, giving as strong and clear a light as any gaslight I ever saw, while the light supplied by the old burners is dim and hardly so good as 3 candle-power.

As shown before the committee, there is used in some of the Government buildings here an economical arrangement for regulating the flow of gas. Now, the gas company claims that where this arrangement is used it is impossible to get the full benefit of the volume of gas furnished. It simply takes off the pressure and regulates the supply. If the pressure is a certain number of pounds, this reduces it to a minimum and keeps it there, regardless of pressure, and it is impossible to get the pressure on the burners that would otherwise be supplied through the gas main. In the Arno Hotel, for instance, where the gas was so poor at one time, it was found on an investigation, when complaint was made, that it was supplied from an old pipe which had been put in years and years ago, and not sufficient in size to supply one-half of the gas that was used in the house.

Mr. HEARD. And if the gentleman will allow me, in that connection, I would say that when the complaint was made, the gas company sent their men up there, made a new connection and put in two new meters, and for some time the lights were good; and when complaint was again made further investigation showed that the proprietor of the hotel had cut off both of the new meters and half of the supply from the old one. That was the case in some other complaints which were investigated. It was want of supply and not the quality of the gas.

Mr. BABCOCK. Now a word as to the illuminating power. Here the standard is 16 candle-power.

Mr. COOMBS. Is that the usual standard throughout the country?

Mr. BABCOCK. No, sir. The illuminating power of gas is measured by different standards. In New York the standard I understand, according to their mode of measurement, would be between 27 and 28 candle power for about 17 candle power according to our standard. There are different standards. The one which we use here is the most rigorous and arbitrary, because, as I have said, it would show between 27 and 28 candle power by the New York standard. My experience here is that with a good burner the gas is just as good, burns as bright and clear, and furnishes as good light as the gas in any other city which I have visited.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. You have not been in many cities.

Mr. BABCOCK. Yes; quite a number.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Because I think it is the meanest gas that I have ever seen in the United States.

Mr. BABCOCK. As to the earnings of the company, a question has been made here. I will state that it was 22.7 per cent last year on the capital stock.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. How much did they want? [Laughter.]

Mr. BABCOCK. That I am unable to say.

Mr. WILSON of Washington. I would like very much to know what else they want. I am surprised. Only 22 per cent! [Laughter.]

Mr. BABCOCK. That was at the rate of $1.25 per thousand feet for their gas. This reduction, proposed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, in price would reduce the earning power of the stock to about 11 per cent on the original capital, after paying interest on bonds.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman allow me to say that if the quality of the gas represents the capital stock at my house, 22 per cent would be a small amount.

Mr. BABCOCK. I would suggest to the gentleman from Maine that if he invests in a few new burners he will probably change his mind as to the quality of the gas.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I have the best I can get.

Mr. BABCOCK. The committee after duly considering the reduction and after thinking on it for many sessions were of the unanimous opinion that, admitting the 16 candle power to be the test, putting the gas at $1 per thousand feet was as great a reduction as they could justly recommend at this time.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Speaker, I do not relish very much giving my own personal experience with regard to this question, but as I have learned from those about me that a large number of other members of Congress hold the same opinions, and have had the same experience, I feel that there is no special objection to my doing it.

Frequently the gas supply at my home is so poor that I have to give up either reading or writing or else get a lamp to light the house with. I have called the attention of the company to the inferiority of the gas, and they have come and put new burners in; they have come and blown out the pipes, and they have come and supplied me with a Welsbach burner, which remains on approval, and sometimes the gas is sufficiently bright to read by and sometimes to write by upon a table situated within 2 feet below the burner. At other times it is impossible to see to either read or to write.

Now, it can not be that the defect is in the pipes; for that has been tested. Nor can it be in the burners, but it is in the kind and quality of the gas supplied to the burners.

The gentleman from Missouri, the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia, extols the virtues and ability of the public gas inspector of this city, Dr. Ford. I find in their own report he states that it might be well to raise the legal standard for gas to 20 candle power by the new Argand gas burner. This is his report.

Mr. HEARD. Not the present Argand burner, but the new Argand burner, which is considerably different from the old.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Or 25 candle power with the flat-flame burner.

Mr. HEARD. Which is equivalent to about 18 of the other.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. There is nothing in this report to indicate that.

Mr. HEARD. I am sure there is.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. What does he mean by saying "raise it to 20 candle power?" If he meant simply a change of figures, to deceive somebody, if he meant simply that it was calling 20 candle power by some other standard, he would not have used the expression "raise."

Mr. HEARD. Most clearly not, and nobody, unless it is the gentleman from Ohio, wants to mislead anybody. I am sure I do not. The statement of Dr. Ford is to raise, that is, to increase this power, and he suggests 20 candle power by the new Argand burner. Now, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE] were to propose to raise this to 20 candle power by the new Argand burner, then he would have the authority of Dr. Ford for the practicability of the suggestion; but his proposition is 22 candle power by the old Argand burner, which is a much more severe test.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. My proposition is that we shall increase the illuminating capacity of this gas at least one-third. That is my proposition, clear and straight. It shall be measured just as it is now, and it shall be one-third better than it is now, and then it will not be any too good for use, nor for the price we are paying.

I do not care to go into the question of the profits made by this company. I want them to have reasonable profits. I do not care to go into the question of the savings that have been made, and the investments that have been made by this company out of their surplus earnings; but now we have reached the time when we are shown by the investigation of this committee, as far as it went, that this company is making water gas, pouring water onto something hot and dissolving it into its constituent gases, and running it through some naphtha, probably, or something of that kind, and conveying it off and selling it. That kind of gas can be made for 38 cents a thousand, and it can be distributed for 22 cents per thousand, and still make money. This Congress legislates for the people of the District of Columbia, 26,000 of whom are patrons of this company, and legislates for the Government, which uses this gas in all the offices, where the employés have suffered in their eyesight for years from the inferior gas; and there is no reason why, when you come to reform this thing, you should not go to a reasonable length. All I ask is that we shall require them to improve the quality of their gas, as well as to reduce the price to a figure which is sufficient.

Several MEMBERS. That is right.

Mr. HEARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire the attention of the House for just one minute. I regret being obliged to take issue with my friend from Ohio, but on a matter of fact I deem it my duty to state to the House that the gentleman, in my judgment, has not been entirely fair in his statement of the case.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. In what respect?

Mr. HEARD. In regard to his own experience. The gentleman has made a statement with regard to his own experience, with which he certainly is familiar; and so far as he has stated it I have no doubt he has stated it correctly. He stated that he had had occasion to make frequent complaints about the quality of the light, and that the gas company have sent to his house repeatedly and have looked over his pipes and put in burners, etc., and that still the light is insufficient. The gentleman has further stated that it is not the fault of the burners or of the pipes in the house.

Now, the gentleman knows that it was stated before the committee, and the gentleman himself stated it, I think, certainly confirmed it, that the company told him that the fault was not in the pipe in the house, after they had tested the matter, or in the burners, but that it was inadequate service pipe outside of the house. And when they had offered to put him in a new pipe, the gentleman refused it, because he said he did not want his front yard torn up to put in the pipe which the gas company thought necessary and offered to put in to give him an adequate supply.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. If the gentleman will permit me. The company had not stated at any time that it was on account of that. But in doing something to have me accept it, as an excuse, they proposed to do that thing; and I did not let them do it. Some of the complaints have been made since my testimony was taken; and have been made necessary because they are still furnishing an inferior quality and an insufficient supply of gas. I have called their attention to it, and they wanted to send a man there, but I told them no; that I merely wished them to furnish better gas, and until they did it was no use, and they need not send a man there.

Mr. HEARD. I have nothing to say so far as that is concerned. I have no interest any further than I am charged with it as a matter that comes before our committee, and I desire to discharge my duty in that respect without regard to anything else. As a member of that committee I made an investigation, and during that investigation it was developed and stated to the committee by the officials, not the officials of the gas company, but the officials of the United States in charge of inspecting the gas, that the complaint as to the insufficiency of the light was on account of the inadequacy of the supply. As to that I think Mr. Ford and all the other witnesses were agreed. The remedy they suggested was an increase in the size of the supply pipes. Now, when the company discovered this they attempted to correct that trouble in the house of my friend from Ohio, where there was an inadequate supply, and they suggested putting in a new pipe for him, and he would not permit it, but still complains.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. If the gentleman will just pardon an interruption there?

Mr. HEARD. Certainly.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Will you explain to me, if there was not an inadequate amount to give good light, how it happens that two or three days in the week there is a sufficient supply and two or three other days in the week it is not sufficient?

Mr. HEARD. I would say to the gentleman that, of course, the pressure varies at different times, and what might be a sufficient pressure to give an adequate supply at one time might not be at another. As stated before the committee by Mr. Ford, the larger the pipes the lower pressure required. The pressure migh be sufficient to give ample light with a pipe of adequate size, but it might not supply it if the pipe was of an inadequate size.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I would say, just to dispose of any suggestion of that kind when advanced, that I went out the last night when the gas was poor, went around to the stores in the neighborhood and looked at their gas supply and the gas supply in the lamps on the street, and I found that they were all bad. The lights were all about as miserable as in my own house.

Mr. HEARD. Of course, I know nothing about that. I know that at times the light everywhere is worse than at other times; whether it is from inadequate pressure or not, I do not know. But I want to say that the statements made by the witnesses before our committee induced the committee to believe, and convinced us, that with adequate pipe service and good burners there was no reasonable ground for complaint. When I lived at the Arno for awhile, and Governor SAYERS, Mr. COBB, and other members were there, complaint was made that the gas was poor. The company sent a man there and found that the service pipe from the street was grossly inadequate, and they put in a new service pipe; and after that was done I never saw a better light anywhere than we had up to the time I left there.

But later a similar complaint was made about poor lights, and it was testified before our committee, on oath, that when the company's man went back there he found that the proprietor had cut off two of the new meters, which it had been necessary to put in to make a sufficient supply, and half cut off the old one; and you might just as well talk about getting sufficient light from any incombustible substance as of getting it through pipes where there is not a sufficient space for an adequate supply of gas to flow. I am not a defender of this company; but as a member of the committee, and having ascertained these to be the facts, I state them simply as a matter of duty to all concerned.

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Speaker, I do not think it can be denied that at many times the gas in the city of Washington is very poor. I think, however, that in many instances it results from the bad pressure. There is one other thing I am afraid we shall find, and that is that the lowering of the price of the gas will not necessarily lower the size of bills. I know that in the city of Brooklyn, when we had the price of gas lowered from $1.80 to $1.35 a thousand, the bills were just the same, and in some cases a little more, the reason being, I think, that putting on an extraordinary pressure forced the gas through so that it could not be consumed.

The cost of gas is so small that they can afford to do that. Now, it seems to me that the jump from 16-candle power to 22-candle power, proposed by the gentleman from Ohio, is too large. If we had the information before us to guide us in that matter, if we knew just what the additional cost would be, we might take the proposed step; but we have not that knowledge, and just because this company is in the power of Congress we do not desire to take extreme measures with it, or to treat it unfairly. We desire to consider all the company's rights. Now, I repeat, we have nothing to guide us in making so large an advance in the candle power, as is proposed by the gentleman from Ohio. I have listened to the discussion and tried to get definite information as to the actual cost, but I haved failed to obtain it, and while I think that the candle power that is now required should not be reduced, I am afraid that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio proposes a jump which is altogether too large under the circumstances, in justice to all parties concerned.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, my sympathies are always excited by a struggling corporation, making its best endeavor to exist under adverse circumstances, and of course they must be very actively moved in this case in view of the statement furnished in report number 629, second session Fifty-third Congress, to which I now direct the attention of the House. This report was made by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD]. I find on page 60 a statement of the receipts and expenditures of the company for the year 1889. I find three items which indicate the net profit of the company for that year, aggregating a total of $401,000. For the next year the same three items, which indicate the net profits, aggregate $370,000. For the next year they aggregate $484,000, and in the fourth year they amount to $380,000. The total of the net profits made by this corporation on a capital of $2,000,000 (much of it I have heard never paid in) is $1,653,000, made in four years of time. It seems to me that that showing does not appeal very urgently to our sympathies.

Mr. HEARD. I will say to the gentleman that the reduction which the committee propose amounts, on the basis of last year's receipts, to about $237,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. That would still leave a profit, on the basis of last year reported in this document, of $187,000 on a capital of $2,000,000, or 9 per cent, which it seems to me would be pretty good. Remember, this net profit that I have spoken of is arrived at after deducting $72,000 to pay the interest on the company's debt at 6 per cent. This report shows that they are able to procure the capital they need in their business at 6 per cent, yet they are exacting from the people of this District 18 per cent on the capital that they claim to have actually invested, thus making the public first repay the interest that they pay on their debt, and then pay about 18 per cent on the capital invested.

Mr. COOPER of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio will prevail. The testimony taken by the investigating committee convinced them that it would be possible to furnish a satisfactory light to the citizens according to the present test. It appeared that in some places there was sufficient light, while in others there was not sufficient light furnished to consumers. I think that a special effort was made by the company during the time the investigation was going on to furnish good light. I think that undoubtedly a higher pressure was put on. There were times when the gas fairly whistled through the burners, and when the ceilings were blackened by the carbon which escaped without being consumed. That was evidently done for the purpose of furnishing a good light to those who had an insufficient supply. I think a higher quality of gas ought to be required. I will read an extract from the statement on this subject of an expert, Mr. Ford, who appeared before the committee:

The CHAIRMAN. In the resolution under which we are working, one of the allegations is that the gas is of inferior quality. It is only justice to the community, and the gas company, that the public should know the facts, and I ask you as one not only qualified, but authorized and directed by reason of your official duty, to state the facts as to the quality of the gas furnished here.

Mr. FORD. The gas burned by the Bray burners, which is a flat flame, averages about 21 to 21.50 candles. The burners now used in New York and in Baltimore are the same. They give a high candle power. We have run as high as 25 candles by a flat-flame burner.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the kind of test made in other cities?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Then would your 18-candle test here make an equivalent in power to the other burners? Is that your statement?

Mr. FORD. It would make 21 to 22.50 candles. I have made a test in the last two days.

Now, the recommendation made by this gentleman is to make the gas from 21 to 22½ candle power; and I understand that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is to make it 22, and I hope that amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. In the five minutes that I have I do not expect to enter deeply into the discussion of this gas question, but I do desire to say that I am in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio. I have no sympathy, individually speaking, with any gas company or with any individual furnishing gas unless it gives a sufficient light. I do know from personal experience that the gas furnished in the District of Columbia during the last five years is not equal, so far as giving satisfactory light is concerned, to the old grease lamp that we used back in my boyhood days. Possibly not many of you gentlemen know anything about that, but I would cheerfully take the old grease lamp, stuck up in the corner of the jamb of the fireplace, in exchange for the gas lights that we have in this city.

Mr. PAYNE. Why do not you do it? [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Oh, I can not talk satisfactorily to a man from New York on this subject. [Laughter.] I presume my friend belongs to the class of gentlemen who have spoken here about the kind of light they get in the fine hotels. I have never been able to find shelter within the portals of those establishments since I have been in Congress, but I presume that in the large hotels, well kept and well supplied in every way, good gas is furnished. I do know, however, the character of the gas in the ordinary boarding houses that I have been compelled to frequent since I have been in Congress. And although in my efforts to secure better light I have bought burners which were larger than those furnished by the boarding-house keepers, yet so far as my individual experience has gone, I can say that our lights in the boarding houses are very poor, and I would willingly exchange them for the old tallow candle or the grease lamp in the corner of the jamb.

Now I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio is a proper one to be adopted. All of us want light of good quality at a reasonable price; and I believe it is a matter of experience, confirmed by the testimony of gas companies in various cities, that 20 candle-power gas can be furnished at $1 per thousand cubic feet, and allow 40 per cent profit on the investment. This I believe to be a fact from the statements of those engaged in the business; and if this be true there is no reason why Congress should not so legislate as to secure to the people of this District better light at a reasonable price.

I understand the bill of the committee proposes a 16 candle-power light, while the amendment is for a 22 candle-power light, at $1 per thousand cubic feet. Without taking time to discuss the subject in detail, I believe from statements of those engaged in this business, that while it is the interest of citizens that such an amendment should be adopted, it will still leave a large profit to the gas company.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. OUTHWAITE, it was agreed to.

No further amendments being offered to the first or subsequent sections, the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HEARD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

NEW TICKETS ON STREET CARS, ETC.

Mr. HEARD. I now call up the bill (S. 443) to provide for the sale of new tickets by the street railway companies of the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act no street railway ticket received for fare on any street railway in the District of Columbia shall again be sold to any passenger, but shall be canceled by the company issuing such ticket.

SEC. 2. That any street railway company doing business in the District of Columbia which shall violate the provisions of this act shall be liable to a fine of not to exceed $10 for each offense, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction.

Mr. HEARD. I ask that the amendment reported by the committee to the first section be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of the first section after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That from and after the passage of this act, each street railway and street herdic transportation company in the District of Columbia shall issue its own tickets, and sell no tickets issued by any other company. Such tickets shall be printed and sold in sheets of six tickets each, and after having been once used shall be canceled by the company which issued the same."

Mr. HEARD. This amendment in the form of a substitute for the first section makes the provisions of the bill applicable to the herdic lines as well as the street-car lines.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. HEARD] explain the necessity for this measure?

Mr. HEARD. The purpose of the bill is to require the street-car and herdic companies to sell their tickets in clean new sheets and to provide that when tickets have been once used they shall not be sold again. Under our present system tickets sold originally in clean sheets are, after being thus used, put again in envelopes and sold again and again until they become filthy and unfit to handle. There are some companies in the city that sell tickets in new clean sheets and do not sell the tickets after having been once used. The object of this bill is to compel all the street-car and herdic companies to do the same.

Mr. DINGLEY. Will not this measure necessitate the preparing of tickets on much thinner paper?

Mr. HEARD. Not at all.

Mr. DINGLEY. The expense of furnishing tickets on cardboard must be considerable.

Mr. HEARD. The railroad companies now print their own tickets, I believe. The herdic companies have not been in the habit of doing so, but have been using tickets printed by the street-car companies. Now, it is the opinion of persons qualified to know that disease is frequently communicated by the handling of old and filthy tickets. The requirement of this bill will be no great tax upon the railroad and herdic companies. They should furnish their customers with clean tickets, which should be canceled when once used.

Mr. DINGLEY. I notice that the bill takes effect from its passage or approval. It would not give any time for the preparation of these tickets.

Mr. HEARD. They will have time enough.

Mr. POST. They are all ready now.

Mr. FUNK. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. HEARD. Certainly.

Mr. FUNK. Do you know of any case where any disease has been communicated from the handling of unclean street-car tickets?

Mr. HEARD. I do not know of any such record. I am neither an expert nor a physician; but many men of good sense and information believe that disease is communicable by filthy tickets. I do not see why it is not. I think it is conceded by all that disease is sometimes communicated by handling unclean paper money.

Mr. FUNK. I apprehend that the street-car companies have an interest in furnishing the community with respectably clean tickets. I do not believe they will impose on the public by reissuing their tickets until they become filthy or diseased, impure, or unfit to be circulated. I have never seen any street-car tickets but what were fairly clean. In other words, it seems to me to be an imposition on the street-car companies and an unnecessary hardship to force them to comply with this law.

Mr. BOWERS of California. I want to say that everyone that travels on the cable road here, as I do every day, knows that he gets these little packages of unclean, dirty tickets over and over again. There is nobody who does not know it. They are used again and again, and come back to the company and are put up in these little packages and again sold to the public; whereas if you go up on the F street line and call for a package of tickets, you get new tickets every time. They do not use them but once. They are punched then, and are kept or destroyed by the company; whereas on the cable line you are very apt to get these dirty tickets that have been used so often that they are not fit to handle.

Now, occasionally you do get a package of clean tickets, or a strip of them, on the cable road, which shows that they are able to print their own tickets and have the facilities. It does not impose, then, any hardship on the cable company or the other street-car companies, for they all print their own tickets anyhow. They ought to be required to furnish clean tickets, and therefore there is no reason in the world why the bill should not pass. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question being taken on the amendments proposed by the committee, they were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HEARD, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ADOPTION OF CHILDREN IN DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HEARD. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. COBB], who desires to call up a bill which was agreed to by the committee, and a report authorized upon it, but which has not been formally reported at this time.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. I ask unanimous consent to consider and pass the bill which I send to the desk, the bill (H. R. 5711) to authorize the adoption of children in the District of Columbia.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That jurisdiction is hereby conferred on any judge of the supreme court of the District of Columbia to hear and determine any petition that may be presented by a person residing in the District of Columbia, praying the privilege of adopting any minor child as his or her own child, and make such minor child an heir at law. If the judge shall find, upon the hearing of such petitioner, that the petitioner is a proper person to have custody of such child, and that the parent or parents or guardian of such child have given their permission for such adoption, he shall enter an order upon the records of the court, legalizing such adoption and making such child an heir at law of such petitioner, the same as if such child was born to such petitioner. If the child has no parent or guardian the judge may appoint a guardian ad litem.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. CULBERSON. I would like to have an explanation of this bill.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. The only object is to provide, as is provided in most of the States, that children may be adopted and made heirs at law of the petitioner.

Mr. CULBERSON. I did not notice that anybody was required to have notice of the proceedings.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. The guardian or parent, and if there be none, the court appoints a guardian ad litem.

Mr. CULBERSON. I would like to have that bill read again.

The bill was read at length.

Mr. CULBERSON. I do not observe that there is any notice provided for.

Mr. SPRINGER. It requires the consent of the parent or guardian.

Mr. CULBERSON. Suppose it is an orphan.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then the court appoints a guardian ad litem.

Mr. PICKLER. Where has the jurisdiction been heretofore?

Mr. SPRINGER. There has been no power to do it.

Mr. BROSIUS. I would like to ask whether there has been any legislation in the District on this subject heretofore?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. None in the District.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is no law on the subject.

Mr. BROSIUS. Certainly then some such provision should be enacted.

Mr. RAY. I would ask the gentleman from Alabama if the bill could not be so amended as to permit a man and wife both to adopt a child?

Mr. COBB of Alabama. That, I think, would be covered by the provisions of the bill as it is reported.

Mr. RAY. As I understand it, the bill says "any person" may adopt a child.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. Anybody who has the qualification for adoption.

Mr. RAY. But the bill is in the singular. It says "any person."

Mr. SPRINGER. That would mean person or persons.

Mr. RAY. I know in New York State we have a similar law, and it reads almost like this, "any person," and this question has come up. I applied to the court within the last month, in behalf of a man and wife, that they might both adopt a child, so that it might become the child of both, and inherit the property of both.

Mr. POST. Move an amendment.

Mr. RAY. The question was raised by the court, and the court held that under our statute the child could only be adopted by one. I think it very wise, in cases where the husband and wife both desire to adopt the child, so that it shall be the child of both, and be adopted by the survivor in case of the death of one, and so that it may inherit the property of both, that there should be a provision that the child may be adopted by both. If there is any doubt about the bill in that respect, I should like to have it amended.

Mr. SPRINGER. The committee have followed the legislation of the States. Perhaps a judicial construction has made it necessary that this amendment should be adopted. Certainly there is no objection to it.

Mr. RAY. If the bill is broad enough to cover that, I am heartily in favor of it.

Mr. WANGER. I move to strike out the word "may" in the last line and to insert the word "shall."

Mr. SPRINGER. That means the same thing. The courts have construed that.

Mr. WANGER. That would make it more clear.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. We do not object to that amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 16 strike out the word "may" and insert in lieu thereof the word "shall;" so that it will read, "the judge shall appoint a guardian ad litem."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RAY. Now, I offer the amendment which I suggested. In line 5, after the word "person," insert the words "or husband and wife."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 5, after the word "person," insert the words "or husband and wife."

Also, in line 7, after the word "her," insert "or their;" so that it will read: "That jurisdiction is hereby conferred on any judge of the supreme court of the District of Columbia to hear and determine any petition that may be presented by a person or husband and wife residing in the District of Columbia, praying the privilege of adopting any minor child as his or her or their own child, and make such minor child an heir at law."

Mr. BROSIUS. I ask that the bill be reported again, as it will read when amended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the Clerk will report the bill as it will read if amended by the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAY].

The bill, as proposed to be amended, was read.

Mr. COBB of Alabama. We accept the amendment.

The amendment offered by Mr. RAY was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. COBB of Alabama, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask unanimous consent to publish some letters and a statement, in addition to what I have already published, in reference to a personal explanation I made some time ago.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HUNTER]?

There was no objection.

The letters and statement referred to are as follows:

COMMITTEE ON MINES AND MINING,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., March 22, 1894.

DEAR SIR: My attention having been called to the statement that you voted against the Alderson amendment to increase the duty on diamonds, in justice to you I will simply state that, being interested in the fate of the amendment, I took pains to notice the vote, and can say I know you voted in favor of the Alderson amendment to increase the duty.

I am, very respectfully, yours,

GEO. P. IKIRT,
Member, Eighteenth Ohio District.

Hon. A. J. HUNTER.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., February 16, 1894.

I was present at the time of passing through the tellers on the question of increasing the tariff on diamonds, and my recollection is that the Hon. A. J. HUNTER passed through the tellers with me, and thereby voted in favor of increasing this tariff.

Very respectfully,

U. S. HALL,
Member of Congress, Second District of Missouri.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, D. C., February 16, 1894.

MY DEAR SIR: I am much surprised to learn that some question has been raised as to your vote on the amendment raising the duty on diamonds from that proposed in the Wilson bill. I was sitting near you at the time, and was specially attracted to the question, and I do not hesitate to say that you voted for it, and do not think I can be mistaken in my recollection.

Truly, your friend,

H. S. G. TUCKER,
Member, Tenth Virginia District.

Hon. ANDREW J. HUNTER.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., February 20, 1894.

MY DEAR SIR: In response to your inquiry as to my recollection as to how you voted on the question known as the Alderson amendment to the Wilson bill, I have to say that when the vote was taken by tellers you went down the aisle with me and passed between the tellers as I did. On that vote I am positive that you voted for the amendment increasing the duty on diamonds. And from frequent conversations with you during the pendency of the bill I know that your inclinations and sympathies were in perfect accord with that vote.

Sincerely yours,

ARTHUR H. TAYLOR,
Member Congress, First District of Indiana.

Hon. A. J. HUNTER,
Washington D. C.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., February 21, 1894.

DEAR SIR: Referring to the question of your voting for the Alderson amendment to raise the rate of duty on diamonds, I am surprised that anyone should question the fact. Sitting next to you while the amendment was pending, I remember that you voted for the amendment, and favored it with more than ordinary case during the close vote that threatened for a time the defeat of the amendment.

HENRY A. COFFEEN,
Member Congress for Wyoming.

Hon. A. J. HUNTER.

Mr. HUNTER. Mr. Speaker, I voted to reduce the duty on farm implements, the tools of the carpenter, blacksmith, brickmason, painter, plasterer, plumber, the tools of all mechanics and laboring people to a revenue duty. I voted against making any discrimination between taxpayers. I hold that the people should pay taxes according to the amount of property they own; that wealth, not want, should pay the expenses of the Government. I believe that taxation should be uniform. In every instance I have voted for a tariff for revenue only, as commanded by the people and directed by the Democratic platform. The people can judge from this record whether I am a Democrat or a demagogue.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT TO THE RULES.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask leave to introduce a rule, and that it be referred to the Committee on Rules, and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] asks leave to introduce a rule, and that it be printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Rules. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The proposed amendment is as follows:

RULE XLVI.

CONCERNING A QUORUM.

1. Whenever, on a yea-and-nay vote upon any question, the record shows that no quorum has voted, the Clerk shall again call the names of those not voting. When the name of any member who is present is called the Speaker shall state the question to him and ask him how he desires to vote. If he votes his vote shall be recorded, but if he refuses to vote his name shall be entered on the Journal as "present and not voting." In determining the result of the vote those present and not voting shall be counted with those voting in the negative. If those voting and those present and not voting shall be a majority of the whole House, a quorum shall be deemed as constituted and the question shall be decided by the record as thus ascertained.

2. If those voting and those present and not voting shall not constitute a quorum the Speaker shall immediately issue his warrant to the Sergeant-at-Arms for the arrest of all members who may be absent without the leave of the House, who, when arrested, shall be brought to the bar of the House, and the Speaker shall state to each member thus brought to the bar of the House the question pending and ask the member how he desires to vote. If he votes his vote shall be recorded, but if he refuses to vote he shall be recorded as present and not voting; and when a quorum is thus constituted the result shall be announced.

3. If a quorum is not constituted as provided herein when the House shall have adjourned, the question pending shall be the first business in order when the House meets again. And the members who have not voted, or who have not been recorded as present and not voting, and those who may be brought to the bar of the House, shall be called upon to vote as if originally present, and the same course shall be pursued as in the first instance until a quorum is constituted.

4. After a quorum appears and the subject-matter which was pending is disposed of, the House may require any member whose arrest was ordered as provided in this rule to show cause at the bar of the House why he should not be punished for being absent without leave of the House.

MESSENGER FOR COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to state to the House that on the 6th of the present month a resolution was adopted allowing an additional messenger for the Committee on Agriculture; but the resolution failed to provide in the usual terms that the money should be paid out of the contingent fund. If there be no objection, the words "to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House" will be inserted after the word "month" in the resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. Does the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture regard that as important?

Mr. HATCH. I make it as a personal request.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted:

To Mr. EVERETT, for ten days, on account of important family business.

To Mr. DRAPER, for ten days, on account of sickness.

To Mr. RUSSELL of Connecticut, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

To Mr. WHEELER of Illinois, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. CAMINETTI, for three days, on account of sickness.

REPRINT OF A REPORT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. PAYNTER] requests a reprint of Report No. 337, the same having been exhausted. Without objection, that order will be made.

There was no objection.

And then, on motion of Mr. HEARD (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, April 10, 1894.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. PASCO. I notice at the foot of page of 4363 of to-day's RECORD that my name is omitted from the list of those voting in the negative on the motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business, and I presume the same mistake appears in the Journal. I was not occupying my seat, but was sitting back of it when I responded to my name, and probably I did not respond loud enough for the Secretary to hear me. I desire to have the correction made.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal will be corrected in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. PASCO. At the foot of page 4363 the nays should be 32 instead of 31, and the number not voting should be 50 instead of 51.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection the Journal as amended will stand approved.

METLAKAHTLA INDIANS IN ALASKA.

Mr. MANDERSON. I appreciate that some of the Senate are familiar—but I know that other Senators are not familiar—with the history of a settlement in Alaska known as New Metlakahtla. I think there is nowhere an account of greater self-abnegation, indeed of utter self-sacrifice than that of William Duncan, an Englishman, who nearly forty years ago went to a barbarous tribe of Indians in British Columbia and started the work of their reformation and civilization; nor is there anywhere an account of greater religious bigotry and of strait-laced oppression than some persons in high places in British America were guilty of towards Duncan and those interesting Indians which compelled them to take refuge in Alaska.

The Government of the United States granted to the Indians what is known as Annette Island, and they have formed there a prosperous Christian community. There are no better people in the district of Alaska than the Metlakahtla Indians. While they have been permitted to acquire the land upon the island and to embark in many industries, even extending their sawmills and canning establishments to places outside of Annette Island, by the construction of the law by the courts of Alaska they have been refused admission to citizenship, for the enjoyment of the rights of which and the performance of the duties of which they are so well fitted.

I have in my hand a communication from Dr. Sheldon Jackson, a gentleman of repute, who has devoted many years to excellent service in Alaska among the natives, setting forth briefly the action of the courts in this regard and giving a brief history of this most interesting people, and important subject-matter. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to have the paper printed as a document and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, with instructions to that committee, if in their wisdom it seems best, to bring in a bill for the consideration of the Senate providing that these Indians may be admitted to citizenship if the present law is indeed insufficient.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection the paper will be printed as a document and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. VEST. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom were referred certain amendments intended to be proposed to the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, to report them favorably. I move that the proposed amendments be printed, and that they may lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VILAS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3318) granting a pension to Mrs. Fannie M. Norman, reported it without amendment.

Mr. KYLE, from the Committee on Education and Labor, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1563) to prevent the abuse of the writ of injunction and other legal process, and for other purposes, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1628) to protect the first day of the week, commonly called Sunday, as a day of rest and worship in the District of Columbia, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1787) to provide for public improvements and employment of the citizens of the United States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1788) to provide for the improvement of public roads, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 459) for the relief of B. F. Myers, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WOLCOTT, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 66) providing additional clerical force for the Librarian of Congress, reported it without amendment.

Mr. PEFFER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1876) to provide for the payment of accrued pensions in certain cases, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. HANSBROUGH (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1877) to authorize the purchase of a site for the Government Printing Office; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. WOLCOTT introduced a bill (S. 1878) for the relief of Meyer B. Haas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BUTLER introduced a bill (S. 1879) to amend an act to regulate the sittings of the courts of the United States within the district of South Carolina; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MCMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 1880) to authorize the Metropolitan Railroad Company to change the motive power for the propulsion of the cars of said railroad company; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HUNTON introduced a bill (S. 1881) for the relief of Edward H. Murrell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENTS TO SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin submitted sundry amendments relating to the National Soldiers' Home, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOAR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

TARIFF HEARING.

Mr. QUAY. I submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate will hold a session on Saturday, 21st instant, from 12 o'clock noon until 1 p. m., to hear a committee of the workingmen's organizations of the United States in opposition to the bill (H. R. 4864) entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection, and the resolution will go over under the rule.

SUSPENDED PENSIONS.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit a resolution for which I ask present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed and required to inform the Senate of the names and post-office address of all pensioners of the Government whose pensions have been suspended or canceled since the 4th of March, 1893, and the cause of such suspension or cancellation.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection, and the resolution will go over under the rule.

COINAGE OF STANDARD MEXICAN DOLLARS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], coming over from a previous day.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I ask for information whether that resolution takes precedence of the resolution which I hope to have disposed of to-day, and which I think can be disposed of merely by a vote. I refer to the resolution respecting the coinage of standard Mexican dollars.

Mr. HALE. And which is the first resolution in order.

Mr. WOLCOTT. It is the first resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the resolution to which the Senator from Colorado refers went to the Calendar under the rule. Unanimous consent was not asked that it should be continued.

Mr. DOLPH. My resolution will occupy only about five minutes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution submitted by me (which if it went to the Calendar went by inadvertence) may be taken up for the purpose of being put upon its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. DOLPH. The Senator simply desires a vote on it? He does not understand that it is to be further discussed?

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understand that it is not to be discussed further.

Mr. DOLPH. I do not object.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I may state that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON] with very great consideration has stated that he will not press his amendment, and as I believe there is nothing more to be said on the resolution, I ask that it may be put upon its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Colorado? The Chair hears none. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. WOLCOTT on the 2d instant, as modified yesterday, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States, if not incompatible with the public interests, with a view to encourage and extend our commercial relations with China and other Asiatic countries, be requested to enter into negotiations with the Republic of Mexico, looking to the coinage by the United States, at its mints, of standard Mexican dollars, under some proper agreement with the said Republic of Mexico as to seigniorage, method and amount of said coinage; and that he be further requested to report the result of his negotiations to the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before the vote is taken on the pending resolution, in favor of which I shall be very glad to cast my vote, I desire to ask permission, without reading, to have printed in the RECORD a communication which I find in yesterday's New York Press from the pen of Moreton Frewen, a noted bimetallist of England, discussing this question very interestingly and intelligently, and giving his adherence to the proposition of the Senator from Colorado.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to printing the matter referred to in the RECORD?

Mr. GORMAN. I trust the Senator from New Hampshire will not make that request.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is a brief and exceedingly interesting communication.

Mr. GORMAN. I know, but ——

Mr. ALDRICH (to Mr. GALLINGER). Read it yourself.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will read it myself. The Senate will be interested in hearing it read, and then it will go into the RECORD.

Mr. President, before reading the paper I will say that while I cast a very reluctant vote in favor of the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman silver law, I felt then, as I feel now, that the time is near at hand when some action will have to be taken by the national Congress to give the country more currency than there is in circulation at the present time. When business revives in this country, as it will sooner or later revive, the country will need more currency, and it will then become a very serious question for the Congress of the United States to determine in what form it shall be granted.

When that time comes I may have some thoughts on the subject which I shall desire to put on record, even though they may be to a certain extent in opposition to the public sentiment of my own State. I believe most thoroughly in bimetallism, and will never give my consent to any legislation in favor of gold monometallism in the United States. This country widely differs from England, France, and Germany in its monetary wants. Those countries are, so far as population is concerned, practically finished countries, while this country is constantly increasing its population at the rate of nearly 2,000,000 a year. That increasing population will demand and should receive increased currency with which to carry on the business operations of the people. The repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman law contracted the currency, and it is evident to every thoughtful mind that that contraction must in due time give way to an expansion of our currency. But I will not discuss that now. The communication to which I have referred is dated Washington, April 6, and is as follows:

MEXICAN DOLLARS IN AMERICAN MINTS—MORETON FREWEN, THE ENGLISH BIMETALLIST, WRITES THE PRESS—FUTURE OF SILVER AND FOREIGN TRADE—HE EXPLAINS THE POSSIBLE INTERNATIONAL SIGNIFICANCE OF SENATOR WOLCOTT'S RESOLUTION INTRODUCED IN THE SENATE LAST WEEK.

To the editor of the Press:

SIR: A resolution was moved in the Senate to-day by Senator TELLER for his colleague, Mr. WOLCOTT, that by agreement with the Mexican Government the free coinage of Mexican dollars should be permitted at the United States mints of Carson City, Nev., and San Francisco. Asthe immense area over which these dollars are to-day legal tender is not very generally appreciated by those interested in the silver question, will you allow me to point out the several trade developments likely to follow if this proposal is agreed to?

Your readers will bear in mind that while the French trade dollar and the American trade dollar have failed to obtain circulation in China, the Mexican dollar, on the other hand, is the current legal-tender money of a large portion of China and the Malay peninsula, as also of England's straits settlements, Borneo and Ceylon. The Mexican mint reports show that during 1892 the coinage of these dollars aggregated twenty-six millions, of which mass all but a million were exported from Mexico. Messrs. Page & Gwyther's report for 1893 shows that some five millions of these coins passed via Suez to Singapore, while not less than eight and a half millions took ship at San Francisco for China. It becomes important, in view of the Colorado Senator's proposal, to know what became of the $12,000,000 exported from Mexico, but not accounted for. Doubtless a considerable portion went west from your Pacific ports in the trunks of home-going Chinese.

SILVER MONEY IN GREAT DEMAND.

It must be borne in mind that the mint charge or "seigniorage" on silver dollars levied by the Government of Mexico is 4½ per cent. The export duty on bar silver is only 2 per cent. It says much therefore for the demand of silver in the form of coin rather than bars that, while some 21,000,000 ounces left Mexico as dollars, only 4,000,000 ounces left as bars. The direction of Senator WOLCOTT's proposal now becomes evident. The great fall in silver causes the Mexican dollar, which used to be exchanged at the rate of 4½ silver dollars for 1 gold sovereign, to now exchange at the rate of 10 silver dollars for a gold sovereign. This operates as a great stimulus to China's exports to Europe and as a contraction of her imports from Europe and America. This revolution in the Chinese and Indian trade, which has followed from the British Government's recent "tampering with" the Indian standard, promises to be the most interesting economic and social problem of the coming years.

China, favored as against India by the present very low rates of exchange with gold-using nations, is about to increase very largely her exports, and will therefore import silver on an unprecedented scale.

It seems probable, then, that with the mints of Carson and San Francisco open to the free coinage of Mexican dollars the silver product of the Rocky Mountains to-day hunting an outlet at heart-breaking prices may go directly west across the Pacific to find a ready demand in China in return for imports of tea, silk, jute, and many other commodities.

CHINA'S GREED FOR SILVER.

That there is a great scarcity of currency in China is not doubtful, as also that the Chinese can absorb silver in the form of coin very rapidly. The imperial mint at Canton, its operations jealously guarded from all scrutiny, appears to be the monopoly of certain high place mandarins, who run it when they require a supply of pocket money. This mint coined last year for all China less than 3,000,000 ounces, of which two-thirds was issued in the shape of 19,000,000 ten-cent pieces. These coins also were probably used for buttons. As suggesting the amount of currency which China might absorb if she could get it, contrast this coinage of only 3,000,000 ounces with the 40,000,000 ounces British India, a poorer and less populous country, has frequently coined in a single year.

Senator WOLCOTT'S proposal may therefore prove to be of international importance. It must make of San Francisco an important exchange center, and with such a dearth of Mexican dollars in China as prevails to-day, it is likely that London merchants importing from China may order these dollars by cable and give gold bills on London in exchange for dollars to be shipped direct from San Francisco to Hong Kong and elsewhere. I am assured here that San Francisco banks would gladly make loans on the security of coined dollars, which are wanted at high rates of interest in China, whereas with the silver market in its present condition, mere bar silver is by no means a negotiable security.

EFFECT IN INDIA.

It may perhaps be worth while to consider the British Indian interest in this new development of your silver policy. The Government of India has recently imposed a duty of 5 per cent upon imports of silver bullion—a duty unprecedented, I believe, in the history of civilized governments. But would this bullion duty be payable also on Mexican dollars? I think not, and if not, then these dollars will be imported in great quantities into India for melting, the 4½ per cent seigniorage leaving the coins still one-half per cent cheaper than bullion silver. But even if the duty should still be collected, these dollars might supply the raw material of the Indian silversmith's trade, seeing that the rupee being now worth more than its bullion value, just as your dollars pass for twice their actual value in silver, has become too valuable to be sent to the melting pot.

And, further than this, it is not impossible that the government of India, now in sore straits as to her currency condition in India, might do worse than make the same proposal to the Mexican Government that Senator WOLCOTT proposes the United States Senate should make.

IS HISTORY REPEATING?

I have ventured to write to you very fully as to this new silver departure, because it seems to foreshadow results that may become of international importance. Your silver party, after defeat at home, after repeated disappointments at Paris and Brussels, is now looking for help westward across the Pacific to that mysterious nation which, if it would absorb even an ounce of silver per capita, can at least mitigate for the world of trade the disaster threatened by the present exchange convulsions of Europe with Asia.

But what a strange commentary it all is upon the conditions of modern "progress" that this stream of abundant money, rejected by Europe, although in the very throes of a currency contraction, should be diverted to flow westward, and be destined, perhaps, to awaken China from a sleep of ages, even as that immense flow of silver from Potosi vivified the industries of Europe and in the short period of sixty years quadrupled all prices. As Prof. Cairnes has written of that mighty flow of silver during the sixteenth century from Potosi, "it rendered possible the remarkable expansion of Oriental trade which forms the most striking commercial fact of the age that followed."

Yours faithfully,

MORETON FREWEN.

WASHINGTON, April 6.

Mr. President, I rose simply to secure the insertion in the RECORD of this valuable contribution to the pending question, and this is all I now say on the subject. I trust the resolution submitted by the Senator from Colorado may be adopted.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado a question which I did not ask him when he was addressing the Senate yesterday, because I did not care to interrupt him. I presume everybody here understood what the Senator meant, but for fear there might be some misunderstanding elsewhere or among the people, I desire to ask him if, when he said yesterday that Mexican silver dollars are at a premium of from 1 to 3 per cent, he did not refer to the premium over the commercial value of the silver bullion they contained, and did not compare the Mexican dollar with any dollar of our issue?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Oh, certainly, above the present bullion value of silver, or above silver coin in any other form except in the country where circulated; for instance, as above rupees they would be at a premium.

Mr. DOLPH. That is, above the silver coin of the countries which are upon the silver basis?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Yes.

Mr. DOLPH. One more question. As I understand the Senator's resolution, the proposition is simply for the United States to contract with Mexico to do the work of coining Mexican dollars?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Turning over the mechanical portion of our mints for the purpose of increasing the silver circulation under their supervision.

Mr. DOLPH. It is not supposed or intended that the United States will in any manner assume any responsibility for the value of or for the circulation of the Mexican dollar?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Not the slightest in any way.

Mr. DOLPH. I understood that, but I desired before the vote to make it plain.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires the attention of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MCPHERSON]. Is the amendment which he proposed withdrawn?

Mr. MCPHERSON. I do not insist on my amendment. I think the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN], which was accepted by the author of the resolution, will cover the whole ground, and therefore I shall not press my amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as modified on motion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN].

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

COINAGE LAWS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. GORMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report a concurrent resolution, and I ask for its present consideration.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 5,000 additional copies of the fourth edition of the document entitled "Coinage Laws of the United States, 1792 to 1894," prepared under the direction of the Committee on Finance, United States Senate, with the Appendix, of which number 1,500 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 3,500 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the concurrent resolution.

Mr. DOLPH. I should like to ask the Senator from Maryland a question and to make a proposition. I think about a month ago the Senate ordered the usual number of this publication printed. It was then suggested that it would be more valuable with an index, and it was ordered to be printed with an index. The gentleman who has, I understand, prepared the document, and who is expected to prepare the index, has been so much engaged over other important and pressing matters, the tariff bill and matters connected with it, that he has been unable to prepare the index. I have received a great many requests for the document, and I ask the Senator from Maryland whether it would not be well to modify the resolution which ordered the usual number printed, so that the usual number may be printed without the index, and we may have some copies for immediate distribution before the index is prepared. I suggest that it would relieve the situation somewhat, as I think the Senate would get 400 copies, which might be sent out to those who request them.

Mr. GORMAN. It is true, as stated by the Senator from Oregon, that the resolution ordering the printing of the usual number, 1,900 copies, did require an index, and that index has not yet been prepared, and I do not think it will be prepared for the next two weeks. I understand it will require about two weeks longer to complete it.

Mr. DOLPH. All the type is set up, and the document is ready to be struck off, but it is held up until the index is furnished.

Mr. GORMAN. The document itself is in type and could be furnished at once. Does the Senator from Oregon make the motion, or does he desire me to do it?

Mr. DOLPH. If no one objects to the request, let it be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask that the usual number be printed without the index.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection it will be so ordered.

Mr. GORMAN. I now move to amend the pending resolution so that the 5,000 copies of the document ordered by it shall be indexed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be so amended, if there be no objection.

Mr. COCKRELL. In the pending resolution I move to insert "6,000" instead of "5,000," and to give the Senate, according to the usual rule, 2,000 copies and the House 4,000. The resolution proposes only 1,500 copies for the Senate and 3,500 copies for the House. I think we ought to stick to the old rule, and I hope that change will be made.

Mr. GORMAN. I have no earthly objection to that amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the resolution be read as amended.

The concurrent resolution as amended was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 6,000 additional copies of the fourth edition of the document entitled "Coinage laws of the United States, 1792 to 1894," prepared under the direction of the Committee on Finance, United States Senate, with the Appendix and an index to the same, of which number 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. I supposed the Senator from Maryland had joined in the resolution the loan laws and the currency laws. They ought to be printed either together or separately, I do not care which.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is the very point I wanted to call the attention of the Senate to. We should have one publication containing all the laws in regard to loans and currency, all the laws in regard to the United States bank, and national banks, and all the laws in regard to coinage, and they ought all to be in one volume. I brought that matter up when the first resolution was introduced, and I understood the chairman of the Committee on Finance to say that they were preparing that kind of a document. It ought to be prepared, and all these laws ought to be together.

We have one volume, which has been printed twice, entitled "Loan, Currency, and Coinage Laws." It contains most of the laws in regard to the loans and currency and most of the laws in regard to the United States Bank and the national banks, and also in regard to coinage, but it is not complete. Some few of the laws are left out. I know I have a copy of it, and I have obtained the old laws which were omitted, and inserted them in it. It is a very valuable document, but it is not well arranged.

We ought to have one volume containing all these laws. It would not make a large volume, it would be a volume of ordinary size. Some committee—the Committee on Finance is the proper committee—it seems to me, ought to take charge of the work and have it done.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the proper authority to codify these laws would be the Treasury Department, because all the laws are there being administered upon daily. If it would be agreeable to the Senator from Maryland, I hope he will ask the Secretary of the Treasury to make such a codification. It could be very readily done. All the laws have been codified except for the last ten or twelve years, and those are but few in number, comparatively. Then they could all be put in a volume and it would be of immense value. I think the circulation of such a book among the people of the United States would be a better distribution of public documents than hundreds of those that are now being distributed, because the whole public mind is now directed to our coinage and currency, and every intelligent man would be happy to have an opportunity to get one of these books. Probably it would be the most instructive document that could be furnished to the people at this time and would be the most gratefully received.

Mr. GORMAN. I quite agree with the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Ohio, but the Senate will remember that the distinguished Senator from Indiana, the chairman of the Committee on Finance, presented this codification of the laws relating to the coinage. I will say to the Senate that I understood the remainder of the laws referred to by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Missouri were being prepared under the direction of the Committee on Finance. So when a resolution was referred for the printing of the usual number of this document the Committee on Printing reported in favor of it.

The only difficulty now is that the index has not yet been prepared by the compiler, and the Senator from Oregon and other Senators have urged me to have the original order providing for the index rescinded, so that 1,900 copies may be printed without the index. I should be very glad to have the remainder of the laws compiled, but I do not want to interfere with the matter under the charge of the Committee on Finance, of which the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is a member.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand the gentleman who has charge of that subject-matter has been constantly at work, and is now employed in dealing with the tariff question and making indexes for the tariff bill and other documents necessary in the discussion of that measure, so that he probably will not be able for a couple of weeks, at least, to undertake the work.

Mr. GORMAN. I have no complaint to make of that. If the Senator from Ohio desires the resolution to lie over and wait for the compilation of the laws relating to the currency, I have no objection; but there is a very great demand now for the particular publicat on referred to in the resolution.

Mr. COCKRELL. I suggest, as this matter is already in type, that we print it.

Mr. GORMAN. The matter will be stereotyped.

Mr. COCKRELL. Yes, it will be stereotyped.

Mr. SHERMAN. The great trouble in separating these laws is that the same law often contains provisions about coinage and about currency; for instance, the resumption act has certain provisions which have been omitted in the volume already published.

Mr. COCKRELL. Each law should be printed in full. That is one of the criticisms I made of the volume already in existence, that section after section has been taken out, which leaves the whole thing indefinite and uncertain, and we have to turn to another volume to ascertain what is the law. Wherever there is contained in one law provisions which embrace currency and coinage, the law should be published in full in each place. That will not take any considerable additional space, but only a few additional pages. Each law should be perfect in whatever place it is printed, and discretion should not be exercised in editing these things.

I shall introduce a resolution, as soon as I can have it prepared, providing that the publication shall be made under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, but I hope that the laws covered by this resolution will be printed. I suggest to the Senator from Oregon that we had better have all these laws printed with an index. If we send one applicant a copy of this volume without an index, and he should see another man have a copy with an index, he will write immediately and ask for a second copy. That is my experience.

Mr. GORMAN. The Senator from Oregon, as I understand, only requests that 1,900 copies may be printed without the index, and that the 6,000 copies provided for in the resolution shall have an index.

Mr. DOLPH. I shall not discuss that proposition if the Senator from Missouri objects to it. The only object I had was to get a few copies to be sent out before the indexed edition was published.

Mr. COCKRELL. I know that. I have applications for it also, but I think we had better have the index with this publication.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution as amended.

The concurrent resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. GORMAN. I send to the desk a report, with an estimate of the cost of printing, to accompany the resolution, which I ask may be printed in the usual form.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That order will be made, in the absence of objection.

THE REVENUE BILL.

Mr. MCPHERSON. I desire, according to the custom which has grown up in this body, to give notice that my colleague [Mr. SMITH], with the indulgence of the Senate, desires to submit some observations upon the tariff bill on Monday next at 2 o'clock, provided it does not interfere with the notice given by any other Senator.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let me suggest to the Senator from New Jersey that it is probable that the tariff bill on Monday will be taken up at 1 o'clock.

Mr. MCPHERSON. Then, I will say at whatever hour the tariff bill is taken up for consideration on Monday next.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask unanimous consent to submit a suggestion to the Senate in regard to the order of business.

Mr. DOLPH. I hope, if the Senator refers to the tariff bill, that he will first allow morning business to be transacted.

Mr. HARRIS. This matter will take but a few moments.

Mr. DOLPH. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Rhode Island? The Chair hears none.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, Senators upon this side of the Chamber are very anxious to proceed to the discussion of the pending tariff bill in an orderly manner, in a manner which will at the same time consult the convenience and comfort of Senators, and in response to a suggestion made yesterday by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], and after conference with the Republican members of the Finance Committee, I suggest that we are willing upon this side of the Chamber for the present, at least for a week, that the Senate shall meet at 12 o'clock, the regular hour; that the tariff bill shall be taken up for consideration at 1 o'clock and remain before the Senate until 5 o'clock each day; that there shall be no dilatory motions and no votes of any kind, and that the discussion shall proceed within those hours.

In view of this suggestion, I trust the Senator from Tennessee, who is in charge of the bill, will consent, for the present at least, not to call up his motion to change the hour of meeting to 11 o'clock, and that he will also withdraw his demand for the reading of the bill, with the hope and belief that when that matter comes up again there may be some arrangement made between the two sides upon the subject.

Mr. HARRIS. If we can have unanimous consent to take up the tariff bill at 1 o'clock each day for a week, as suggested by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], and proceed with the general debate upon the question until 5 o'clock each day without interruption, I shall consent to let my motion made yesterday, changing the hour of meeting from 12 to 11 o'clock, lie over, and I shall also consent to withdraw my request for the present reading of the bill, and let those matters go over, to be determined hereafter, not to be, however, suggested during the pendency of this consent agreement.

I think, all things considered, that it is a fair and reasonable adjustment; and so far as I am personally concerned, I hope the Senate will give unanimous consent to it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire the attention of the Senator from Rhode Island as well as of the Senator from Tennessee. Let us see if we exactly understand the proposition. The proposition, as I understand, is for this week and not for one week from this day.

Mr. ALDRICH. I stated for "at least a week," but I am not very particular about that.

Mr. COCKRELL. I wanted to understand it, because neither Senator specified with sufficient definiteness to my mind; but I understood the agreement was for this week.

Mr. HARRIS. I am perfectly satisfied to limit the agreement to the present week. I should not object, however, if it were to be for one week from to-day.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that it be one week from to-morrow, if that is perfectly agreeable to the Senator.

Mr. BUTLER. Make it one week from to-day.

Mr. ALDRICH. To begin to-morrow. The arrangement will have to begin to-morrow in any event. I am not, however, particular about that.

Mr. HARRIS. Very well. Let the arrangement be until next Monday.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. DOLPH. Before the sense of the Senate is taken on the question, I ask if that agreement will exclude executive sessions?

Mr. HARRIS. It will exclude executive sessions except after 5 o'clock.

Mr. COCKRELL. And before 1 o'clock.

Mr. HARRIS. And before 1 o'clock.

Mr. DOLPH. It will exclude for a week any business that may be now pending in executive session.

Mr. BUTLER. Not at all.

Mr. HARRIS. By no means. It would exclude a motion for an executive session, unless it was made before 1 o'clock or after 5 o'clock.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH]? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT SALEM, OREGON.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. DOLPH on the 6th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 65) to provide for the construction of a public building at Salem, Oregon, be, and is hereby, discharged from the further consideration thereof; and said bill is ordered to be placed on the Calendar for consideration by the Senate in its regular order.

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to hear some reason why the committee should be discharged from the further consideration of the bill named in the resolution and the bill be brought before this body for passage without any report and without any action of the committee? It is a very strange proceeding.

Mr. DOLPH. I am going to state the reason for the resolution.

Mr. President, I wish to disclaim any disrespect for or discourtesy to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. So far as I know, there has never been any opposition in the committee to the bill referred to in the resolution, and there has been substantially no opposition to it in the Senate.

The bill referred to was introduced in the Fiftieth Congress; it was then Senate bill 21, introduced by me December 12, 1887, reported March 19, 1888, and passed the Senate April 17, 1888. It was not reported in the Fiftieth Congress in the House of Representatives. In the Fifty-first Congress the bill was again introduced by me; it was then Senate bill 78. It was introduced December 4, 1889; reported February 10, 1890; passed the Senate March 13, 1890; reported to the House of Representatives April 22, 1890. In the Fifty-second Congress it was Senate bill 534, introduced by me on December 10, 1891, reported January 12, 1892, and passed the Senate January 20, 1892. A similar bill was introduced by my colleague in the other House, and was reported in the Senate March 24, 1892.

The bill was again introduced by me on the 8th of August last, more than eight months ago, and was referred to the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It has not been reported by that committee at the present Congress. It will be seen that the bill has been heretofore three different times favorably reported by that committee, and has passed the Senate three times.

There have been seventy public building bills introduced in the Senate at this session and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. None of them, I believe, has been reported, and what the committee proposes to do in regard to the reporting of bills for public buildings at the present session of Congress or during the present Congress I am not advised.

I do not propose to quarrel with the committee about any policy they may think it necessary to adopt in regard to the seventy bills providing for the erection of public buildings which are now before the committee. There are four bills relating to public bills in Oregon before the committee. One is to increase the further limit of cost of the public building at Portland, Oregon; another is the bill referred to in the resolution, for the construction of a public building at Salem, Oregon; another is for the construction of a public building at Baker City, Oregon, a bill introduced by myself, and reported favorably during the last Congress; and still another is for a public building at The Dalles, Oregon, introduced by my colleague.

The bill which I have selected, with which to test the sense of the Senate, is a bill which has not only been three times favorably reported in the Senate and twice favorably reported in the House of Representatives, but has three times passed the Senate. Besides, it is a bill for the erection of a public building at the capital of the State.

The senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL], when I was discussing the bill for a public building at Salem during the last session, said in the Senate—or if not, he said to me privately afterwards, I think he made the statement in the Senate—that the rule of the Senate had always been to authorize the construction of a public building at a State capital.

Mr. President, of course my constituents hold me responsible for the success of this measure and for other similar measures which I have presented to the Senate.

The object of the resolution is to ascertain whether the policy of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which has been followed for the eight months since the bill referred to was introduced, is to be the policy of a majority of the Senate. I desire a vote of the Senate upon the resolution, without any desire to cast any reflection whatever upon the committee. I do not quarrel with any policy the committee may see fit to adopt owing to the condition of the Treasury or otherwise.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, this is an extraordinary resolution; and I ask the attention of the Senate to the statement I am about to make, as there are a great many of these bills authorizing the construction of public buildings pending before the Joint Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the two Houses of Congress.

When I became chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate, the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Carlisle, called upon the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the House and upon me, and requested, if compatible with our views of the necessities of the public service, we should not recommend the passage of bills which made original appropriations for new public buildings until the monetary depression, which was then threatening the country, should either pass away or its extent be ascertained. He apprehended then—and subsequent events showed that he was correct—a large deficiency in the Treasury of the United States, a deficiency which he afterwards estimated at $20,000,000, and subsequently at $70,000,000, and the extent of which to-day can not be definitely stated by anyone.

How long this is to continue, and what is to be the effect of legislation had by Congress in regard to taxation, no one who does not possess the gift of prescience can possibly state with any exactness to the country.

We know very well the condition of business; we know the condition of the Treasury; we know the financial uncertainty as to the future, and I perfectly agree with the Secretary of the Treasury that, until the clouds have passed away, until we can see our pathway with some sort of certainty, it will be reckless and almost criminal to pile up additional indebtedness when we do not know the sources from which the money can be had with which to meet it.

If the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds had been guilty of discrimination against the bill of the Senator from Oregon, there would be some sort of pretext for his action here to-day. No bill for an original appropriation has been reported from that committee; no discrimination has been had. We are simply waiting to know what will be the financial legislation of Congress and the probable condition of the Treasury before we assume the pecuniary obligation which would arise from passing any of these bills.

There has been a rule adopted by our committee—and one which has my entire assent—that the capital of every State in the Union shall have a Federal building. It is just as certain as the existence of this Government, that the capital of Oregon will have a Federal building in the near future; but until we know how much money will be in the Treasury, until we can see our way, as any ordinarily prudent business man would in the transaction of his own business, it would, I repeat, be not only reckless, but almost criminal for us to pile up enormous indebtedness on this or any other account, unless it be absolutely necessary.

As to the public buildings which are in course of construction or for which Congress has already made appropriations, as a matter of course we are compelled to furnish enough money to preserve those buildings in their present condition, in order that the effects of the weather and the wear and tear will not destroy the investments already made in that regard by the United States.

Mr. President, I am glad that the resolution of the Senator from Oregon gives me an opportunity to make an official exhibit in regard to the condition of the public buildings of the United States, those already constructed and those which we propose to construct hereafter.

I have in my hand a paper sent to me from the Treasury Department by the Supervising Architect, giving the number of public buildings finished and paid for by the United States. They amount to 251 now completed, for which the Government has expended $109,798,187.97.

Mr. FRYE. What is the total number of buildings?

Mr. VEST. The total number is 251, excluding the buildings in Alaska, which are inconsiderable in number.

I ask that this statement be printed as a miscellaneous document for the convenience of Senators.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, now I come to a question more pertinent to the resolution offered by the Senator from Oregon.

I have also here a list of buildings now on the books of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department, embracing buildings not commenced and those in course of erection, giving the limit of cost under existing legislation, and the total amount appropriated. There are of those buildings in number 104, and I have a list of them in the respective States, with the limit of appropriation as to cost and the amount already appropriated. Congress has appropriated for the erection of these buildings the sum of $22,802,317.69.

Mr. PASCO. Is that the amount appropriated or the limit of the appropriation?

Mr. VEST. That is the amount appropriated.

Mr. PASCO. What is the limit of appropriation?

Mr. VEST. The limit of appropriation is $32,827,664.69.

I call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we have one hundred and four buildings, some of which have been commenced and some of which have not been commenced, for which the Government has already pledged its credit to the amount of $32,827,664.69. Is it prudent, is it safe, with this enormous indebtedness already incurred by us, and the money—it is true not taken out of the Treasury, but liable to be taken out at any time—to rush blindly forward, without any immediate and actual necessity for it, in a time of the greatest possible distress, governmental and personal, to make appropriations until we have ascertained the exact policy and resources of the Government in the near future? That is the whole of this question.

Mr. DOLPH. Will the Senator have that statement published with the other?

Mr. VEST. Certainly. I shall ask that this statement be published as a separate document.

Mr. DOLPH. Will it not be better to have them published together?

Mr. VEST. Very well, let them be published together.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. VEST. Let me say to the Senator from Oregon that the claims of his State will be fairly and equitably met. There has been no discrimination on the part of our committee, and no such intention. I know but one rule in regard to my public action, and that is to conduct the business of this Government, its importance and magnitude considered, upon the same principles of prudence and discretion which I would apply to my own. If I found myself in embarrassed circumstances, with a limited amount of money at my command, and contemplated the erection of a residence or a business house, and a great panic like that from which the country is now suffering should come, I should consider myself unworthy of the name of a prudent business man if I rushed on blindly and incurred obligations which I saw no immediate chance of meeting.

If the Senator from Oregon will but wait, it is the intention of the committee, as soon as we find out exactly how much money we are to raise and what is the condition of the country and the Government financially, to meet the demands for other public buildings, and in the mean time, at all events, to preserve those buildings which are now in process of construction and to redeem the promises of the Government as to appropriations already made.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the promise he makes to the Senator from Oregon, which may not be acceptable to that Senator, and that is, that justice, and only that, shall be done to the State of Oregon. With the persistence, energy, and determination of the Senator from Oregon in behalf of appropriations for that State, if the Senator from Missouri succeeds in preventing the Senator from Oregon from getting more than twice what justly his State may be entitled to, he will be smarter than I think he is. [Laughter.]

Mr. DOLPH. Mr. President, I of course duly acknowledge and duly appreciate the compliment intended to be paid to me concerning my energy; but I think the Senator from Maine is doing me an injustice. I never ask anything but justice, and the Senator from Missouri will bear me witness that I did not complain of any discrimination by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I stated that there were seventy bills before that committee for public buildings, and I procured copies of them in order that I might know that fact. I have been treated precisely like the Senators who introduced those seventy bills. I said it was simply a question of policy, and all I desired to ascertain was whether a majority of the Senate agreed with the majority of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds that all appropriations for public buildings must for the time being be stopped.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the resolution.

Mr. QUAY. Before the question is put, as a member of the minority of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I think it proper to mention that I agree with the policy adopted by the committee, and do not believe that committee should be discharged from the consideration of this bill. There is certainly no reason why a discharge should be effected such as that proposed by the Senator which would not apply to almost every one of the public building bills before the committee.

I assented to this policy, Mr. President, because in view of the imbecile financial management of the present Administration, the apparent inability of the majority in the other House of Congress and in this to get together upon any satisfactory financial agreement, and the probable passage of what is known as the Wilson tariff bill, I believe there will be a vacuum in the Treasury, and it will be safer not to go forward with any new public improvements, but to husband our resources for the protection of those already in the course of construction; in other words, that we should not load up a probably bankrupt Treasury with appropriations not certainly necessary.

I shall therefore vote against the resolution of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. VEST. I wish to make one statement somewhat personal to myself and simply to accentuate my sincerity in what I have stated.

There are three towns in the State of Missouri, all equally anxious for the erection of public buildings, and their people consider it a great outrage that such buildings have not been commenced. At a former session of Congress bills were passed for the erection of those buildings. Under existing circumstances, I have declined to reintroduce those bills. I have stated to my constituents frankly the condition of the Treasury, and that I could not, with my views in regard to official duty, ask Congress under the circumstances to enter upon new appropriations.

In addition to that, there is a public building now being erected in the city where I live. I have not asked any additional appropriation to carry on that work. I simply mention this to acquit myself of having any selfish or sinister design or object, either now or hereafter, in regard to this matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution proposed by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. DOLPH. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MORRILL. I think the pending resolution had better be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. At the last meeting of the committee we were not able to have a majority present; but I think it was very clearly indicated by those present that before the adjournment of the present Congress there will be appropriations for buildings at the capitals of States which have not buildings already, and also for buildings in process of construction where further money is necessary to complete them. I therefore move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. PASCO. Mr. President, I was a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds during the extra session of Congress and for the most part of the present session, although I am not now a member of that committee, and I rise to state that I agree entirely with the views expressed by the chairman of the committee.

There are two buildings in my own State in which we are very much interested, and bills for their erection have passed the Senate at previous sessions; yet the committee has taken no action whatever, either favorable or unfavorable, with reference to those buildings simply because of the existing condition of the Treasury.

There has been no disposition on the part of the committee to discriminate against the Senator from Oregon, and I think if the list of the public buildings now in process of erection had been read through, it would have been seen that Oregon certainly has secured her share, if not more than that.

Under these circumstances, I shall be compelled to vote against the resolution. Oregon has been treated as fairly as any other State, and the Senator from Oregon has been treated with the same courtesy that other Senators have been.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator should vote, then, to have the resolution referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. VEST. I thought the motion was to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] has moved to refer the resolution to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and that is the pending motion.

Mr. PASCO. I did not understand that to be the motion.

Mr. DOLPH. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BATE. We do not understand in this part of the Chamber what is the proposition under consideration, whether to discharge the committee or to refer the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the condition of the question. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] that the pending resolution be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Upon that motion the Senator from Oregon asks for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I am not usually in very hearty accord with the ambition of the Senator from Oregon, especially upon the question of appropriations; but there is a principle involved in his motion which I think ought to be considered by the Senate.

I say, with all due respect to the Senate and its rules, that in the year I have been here I have been constantly impressed with the thought that the rules of this body are so constructed as to impede rather than to facilitate the public business. A bill introduced in the Senate when it once leaves the hand of the Senator who introduces it passes hurriedly into the possession of the committee organized to receive it. That committee very rarely, if a majority of it are against the measure, report it or report progress upon it until they are called upon by a resolution such as the Senator from Oregon has introduced in this case.

I have introduced a number of bills, which to me at least have some importance, whether they have to other Senators or not. Those bills have been referred to committees, and I suppose pigeonholed months ago. I have never been able to obtain thus far even an unfavorable report upon them so that I might have an opportunity to place the bills upon the Calendar with the unfavorable report attached to the end that they can be considered by the Senate. These bills seem to be suspended in the air. There is no possibility of getting a favorable report and no possibility of getting an unfavorable report; but the purpose seems to be to have them die a quiet death in the pigeonholes of the committee room, so that the country will not know what has become of them.

While I say that ordinarily I should not be in sympathy with the motion of the Senator from Oregon, I am in favor of it in this instance, because I want to see the rule introduced here of reporting some time in an ordinary lifetime upon bills that may be introduced and referred to committees.

Mr. DOLPH. I wish to say again that the purpose of this resolution is not to gain advantage over any other Senator or over any other public building bill. It is simply to get a vote of the Senate to see if a majority of the Senate approve of the policy of the committee.

Mr. HOAR. I was sorry to hear the announcement of the policy of the committee by the Senator from Missouri, and I hope Congress will proceed in its ordinary way providing for the public wants and the reasonable expenditures of the Government. I am sorry that that Senator seems to think that the mischievous schemes which he is supposed to be favoring, and is to some extent the father of, are going to keep the country in its present condition for a long time. I suppose these public buildings will not be built by very large expenditures during the present year. It takes some time to get the designs from the Supervising Architect, some time to purchase the land and to agree upon the site. I think we had better act as if we all hoped and believed that the threats which are now filling the people of the country with alarm will soon pass by, and we had better legislate as if the country was going to recover its accustomed prosperity very speedily.

Mr. VEST. It is absolutely impossible for the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] to discuss any sort of measure here without injecting his partisan feelings and opinions. The "mischievous schemes" which I am advocating could be very well discussed when the tariff bill comes before the Senate. Everybody who knows the Senator from Massachusetts knows that no rules of the Senate will insure his silence upon that or any other question. When the tariff bill comes up for discussion I shall be very glad to discuss the question submitted. I care nothing for that sort of talk.

I wish to say, in answer to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] that he seems to be under the impression that there is a system of stifling legislation going on in the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds and other committees. He is very much mistaken.

We do not wish to report against these public buildings. We have an indebtedness of $32,000,000 now upon us, and we simply want to wait to see what will be the financial legislation of Congress, which will very soon be determined, and what will be the financial condition of the country, in order to decide whether we shall recommend so many buildings equitably distributed amongst the States and with a view to their importance and need in the respective States. That is all. Does the Senator want us to report the bills back now without recommendation or adversely? We are unwilling to do that. There is no great necessity for these buildings and the country will not suffer because they are not commenced. We are now trying to complete those which we have commenced.

If the doctrine advocated here to-day, or which seems to be advocated, should prevail, we should go on and make appropriations without looking at the condition of the Treasury, without considering the probabilities of the future, and pass every bill which has an appropriation in it. I do not understand why we should do that, and I shall certainly not act upon any such assumption or argument.

I hope that the motion of the Senator from Vermont will prevail.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to remind the always garrulous and voluble Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] that the form of argument which he himself says ought not to be introduced was introduced by him. It was he who suggested that the Senate could not go on with the ordinary provisions for the convenient transaction of the public business because of certain very painful and disturbing conditions of the public finances. I observed in answer to that only that I thought those conditions would pass away. I had said nothing about the tariff, and the Senator, like a small boy who is defeated in a contest, runs off and hurls back a personality as he disappears.

Mr. PEFFER. While this subject is before the Senate, I wish to again call the attention of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to the fact that there is a resolution now before that committee, referred perhaps five months ago, in relation to the backwardness of work in the Supervising Architect's Office, where they are several years behind as to some buildings, and especially as to one in the State of Kansas, where they are some five or six years behind in the matter of preparing designs and specifications for the building, for which appropriations were made long ago. I think if the committee would exercise a spirit of inquiry in that direction perhaps some good would result from it; at any rate I think it would help us a little in our part of the country.

Mr. VEST. I wish to say, in reply to the Senator from Kansas, that the matter to which he refers is under consideration by the Supervising Architect and the Secretary of the Treasury. I have had interviews with them and correspondence with them. The difficulty seems to be in regard to the method by which relief can be given to the Bureau of the Supervising Architect. It is a mere question of method and of detail. I agree with the Senator from Kansas that that Bureau should be thoroughly reorganized. There is a joint committee now at work, appointed by the two Houses of Congress to investigate the methods of business in the Executive Bureaus and Departments, and we have been awaiting their report, especially upon the Supervising Architect's Bureau, hoping that we could agree in regard to the remedy that should be applied.

Mr. PEFFER. I am very glad to hear it.

Mr. VEST. As soon as possible that matter will be attended to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] that the pending resolution be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. Upon that motion the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BUTLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. If his colleague will state how the Senator from Pennsylvania would vote, if present, I shall be obliged to him.

Mr. QUAY. I do not know, but I take it for granted that my colleague would vote "yea."

Mr. BUTLER. Then I vote "yea."

Mr. GORDON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WILSON]. I do not know how he would vote upon this question, and I withhold my vote on that account.

Mr. MCMILLAN (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. VANCE]. I do not know how he would vote, and I withhold my vote.

Mr. MANDERSON (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], who is absent.

Mr. POWER (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from California [Mr. WHITE], and withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MCMILLAN. My colleague [Mr. STOCKBRIDGE] is paired with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GIBSON].

CONSIDERATION OF THE REVENUE BILL.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Mr. President, I ask that the short time before 2 o'clock be devoted to the consideration of the bill (S. 1545) to provide for the destruction and extermination of the noxious plant or weed known as Russian thistle or Russian cactus, technically Salsola kali tragus.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that morning business has not yet been completed. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. ALLEN on the 9th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That on Monday, June 4, 1894, at 2 o'clock p. m., general debate on the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes, shall cease and the Senate shall begin the consideration of the bill and the amendments thereto under the five-minute rule, and that on Thursday, the 7th day of June, 1894, at 2 o'clock p. m., the final vote shall be taken by the Senate on said bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me for a moment?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir; for a moment.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to ask the Senator if it would not be convenient for him to have the resolution considered at some other time, so that the bill I have indicated may be considered?

Mr. ALLEN. I prefer to have the resolution disposed of this morning. I shall occupy the time of the Senate for but a few minutes.

Mr. President, I was induced to offer this resolution for the purpose of fixing a time when the very important measure that is now pending before the Senate can be finally considered. I am well persuaded that under the rules of the Senate as they now exist it is impossible to reach a final conclusion or a final vote upon any measure pending before the Senate as long as anything like reasonably active opposition may be interposed.

Mr. ALDRICH. I desire to make an objection to the resolution on a question of order; but I do not care to do it now. Whenever it comes up again I desire to object to it on that ground.

Mr. ALLEN. That there is a necessity of disposing of the bill within a reasonable time I think there can be no doubt. The condition of the country is such as to require reasonably prompt and efficient action upon the part of the Senate, and after a sufficient time has been granted to Senators to discuss the measure as fully as may be proper or necessary, I think a time ought then to be fixed, or it ought to be fixed now, when the final vote upon the bill shall be taken, and the country relieved in some degree from its present distressed condition.

Mr. President, I desire to repeat in substance what I had occasion to say a few minutes ago upon another measure: that in the short time I have had the honor of occupying a seat in this Chamber I have been convinced more and more of the fact that the rules of this body are so constructed as to obstruct rather than to expedite the public business. There are introduced in the Senate a great many measures of considerable importance, or at least their authors think them important and a respectable portion of the people of the country think them important, and they suddenly go out of sight. They go into some committee organized and constructed for their reception. They go into a pigeonhole in the committee room and the people are never informed, either by a favorable or an adverse report upon them, of their destiny unless they meet the approval of a majority of the committee.

I wish to enter my protest against the rightful authority of any committee to pigeonhole a measure and refuse or neglect to report it. When a bill is introduced to the Senate and is sent to a committee, it is the duty of that committee, in my judgment, to make a report upon it one way or the other within a reasonable time after its reference. The people have a right to know what has become of the measure; they have a right to know what action the committee will take upon it; they have a right to have it brought back to the full Senate and to take the sense of the Senate upon it.

But as business is transacted here, if a bill introduced by me or by any other Senator, reaches a committee, a majority of whom are not favorable to it, they do not do us the honor and justice of reporting adversely upon it; they will not give us an opportunity to place it before the Senate and take a vote upon it; they will not put it in the arena of debate here, where the country can understand its merits and the disposition to be made of it. It is run into a committee room, into a closet, or a pigeonhole where no Senator in this Chamber can reach it unless he shall arise here and introduce a resolution to discharge the committee from the further consideration of the bill and have it returned to the Senate.

It is evident that the people of this country want prompt and efficient action upon the tariff measure. I do not say that they want the bill passed or that they want it defeated. They want action. I do not commit myself to the bill, nor am I committed against its passage. I do believe that the people of this country want and I think they are entitled to a decisive vote in this Chamber upon this important measure after the lapse of a month or two for its proper consideration and debate. If there is any expectation upon the part of the party in power in this Chamber to reach a vote upon the measure, prompt action must be taken now looking to the consummation of that vote.

Last summer when we had under discussion the bill to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman act, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], and the senior Senator from New York [Mr. HILL] all introduced resolutions or propositions to amend the rules looking to a prompt vote upon that measure. I take it for granted that the Republican side of the Chamber is committed to the doctrine of the revision of the rules, so that within a reasonable time after debate the Senate may come to a vote upon this or any other important measure pending before it. That there is an unalterable determination upon the part of the other side of the Chamber to defeat the tariff measure I have not the slightest doubt. I would not say there is any disposition, or will be, to filibuster, but there is a disposition to lengthen out the debate and to prolong it to such an extent that there can not be a final vote upon it during this Congress.

On the 25th day of October, 1893, the Hon. THOMAS B. REED, of Maine, an apostle of the doctrine of high protection and one of the chief actors in one of the greatest shows upon earth at this time, in delivering a speech in Boston used this language:

And let me tell you—

Speaking to his audience—

right here, that there is no State so deeply interested as the State of Massachusetts.

He was then talking upon the question of the tariff and the industrial prosperity of New England.

If it were not for its condition I should say: "Let these men try it. Let us have the lesson of free trade burned into the quick; and then let us have peace." But when Massachusetts sits around to mourn her destroyed factories, her ruined industries, her ruined machine shops, she sits around to mourn for eternity; for if they are once destroyed, the omnivorous West will do the manufacturing for the country. You have the start, you have the power, you have the prestige. You can keep it, or you can throw it away; and the only way in which you can keep it is by making the voice of the majority of your people to be heard, and to be heard across the country.

This expression was met by applause by the audience.

Mr. President, I cite this excerpt from the speech of Mr.

REED for the purpose of showing the bitter opposition that is to be offered to every measure that has for its purpose the reduction of the tariff, and to every measure that is designed in any respect to modify the existing law. There the people were told, at that great meeting, that New England had it in her power in effect to crush out the ambition of the West; that if she did not look out for her interests in keeping the act of high protection a law the great, "omnivorous West" would destroy her, and would become the manufacturing center of this country.

When this question is looked upon in that light, when it has become a sectional question, when New England and the Eastern States are told that they have the entire manufacturing interest of the country in their own hands, that they have all of the glory and the prosperity which result from it, are we not to expect bitter, determined, and relentless opposition upon the part of the other side of this Chamber to the pending tariff bill?

Now, it strikes me that it is the part of wisdom for us to fix early in the discussion, by proper resolution or amendment of the rules, a time when the final vote upon the pending bill shall take place.

Mr. ALDRICH. In the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Rules, I do not intend to enter upon a defense of that committee in regard to any action or want of action which they may have taken or failed to take upon certain amendments to the rules which have been referred to them. Neither do I now intend to answer the suggestions made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] as to the position of New England in regard to this question. I will merely say to that Senator, for his information, that he is entirely mistaken as to the attitude of the people of New England upon this question and as to the effects of the proposed legislation upon them in comparison with its effects upon the other sections of the country.

However, I rose simply to enter my objection to the resolution, which proposes, in the form of a resolution, a change in the rules. Such a change can be made only by notice as provided by the fortieth rule.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the point I raise be decided by the Chair.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to submit a motion to amend the resolution first.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not care about a motion to amend. I think it can be disposed of. I ask for a ruling of the Chair upon the point of order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not understand the Senator's question of order.

Mr. ALDRICH. I think the Chair understands it.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Chair or the Senator will state the point of order, I may want to speak upon the question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair). The Chair understands the Senator from Rhode Island to make the point of order that the resolution now under consideration by the Senate proposes to change the rules of the Senate, and that under Rule XL it is not in order.

Mr. ALDRICH. That is the point exactly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will have Rule XL read.

The Secretary read as follows:

RULE XL.

SUSPENSION AND AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

No motion to suspend, modify, or amend any rule, or any part thereof, shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing, specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof. Any rule may be suspended without notice by the unanimous consent of the Senate, except as otherwise provided in clause 1, Rule XII.

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not think the resolution is a proposition to change or amend the rules. It is entirely an independent resolution, as I understand it. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Rules. Prior to that motion I suggest to the Senator from Nebraska certain amendments. He fixes Thursday, the 4th day of June, 1894, at 2 o'clock post meridian, as the time when the general debate on the bill shall cease. I move to strike out "Monday, June 4," in the first line, and insert "Monday, April 30"; so that it will read: "That on Monday, April 30, 1894, at 2 o'clock post meridian, general debate on the bill," etc. Then, in line 7, I move to strike out "Thursday, the 7th day of June," and insert "Monday, the 14th day of May." I hope the Senator from Nebraska will accept the amendments and let the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. ALLEN. I will accept the amendments, if I understand them correctly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask for a ruling upon the point of order I raised. I have no objection to the resolution going to the Committee on Rules, but if it is to be considered I shall insist upon my point of order.

Mr. ALLEN. The amendments are acceptable to me.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator from Nebraska has a right to accept the amendments. Then my motion is to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Nebraska to accept the amendments, and the Senator from Rhode Island withdraws the point of order. The Senator from Missouri moves to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CHANDLER. I rose to move certain amendments to the resolution. I waited to have the point of order decided by the Chair. Pending its decision the Senator from Missouri obtained the floor and moved to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules. After moving to refer it to the Committee on Rules he offered certain amendments to the resolution, and secured their acceptance by the mover of the resolution. That, I think, is the parliamentary status of the resolution, the Chair not yet having ruled upon the point of order raised by the Senator from Rhode Island.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Rhode Island to withdraw the point of order made, as the Senator from Missouri had moved the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. ALDRICH. If unanimous consent can be given now to have the resolution go to the Committee on Rules I will waive the point of order.

Mr. CHANDLER. I only desire to move my own amendment, and then I shall be willing to have the resolution with the proposed amendment go to the committee. I have been a little disconcerted, as I am apt to be, by the Senator from Missouri getting the floor and amending the resolution with the consent of the Senator from Nebraska, so that I am put rather in the background in offering my amendment. Senators will excuse the dilatoriness; I know the Chair will do so.

Now, if my amendment can be received and be referred with the resolution to the Committee on Rules I shall be entirely satisfied with that disposition of the subject.

Mr. COCKRELL. Unquestionably the Senator from New Hampshire has a right to offer an amendment and have it go to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. CHANDLER. I am only explaining my own momentary disturbance that before I could offer my amendment the Senator from Missouri succeeded in getting the resolution amended. I move to strike out in line 6 the words "under the five-minute rule," and in the seventh line to strike out "Monday, May 14," and insert "Thursday, the 22d day of November," as the date when the final vote shall be taken upon the bill. With that amendment I have no objection to the resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. I desire to inquire of the Senator whether he meant November, 1894, or November, 1895?

Mr. CHANDLER. I was proposing 1894, but I am entirely willing, if the Senator from Tennessee desires it, to substitute 1895. I always like to accommodate the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. My desire has been to understand the Senator from New Hampshire, if possible. I do not desire the postponement to either date.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request that the resolution and the amendment shall be referred to the Committee on Rules? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 6th instant approved and signed the act (S. 1836) to give effect to the award rendered by the Tribunal of Arbitration at Paris, under the treaty between the United States and Great Britain concluded at Washington, February 29, 1892, for the purpose of submitting to arbitration certain questions concerning the preservation of the fur seals.

THE REVENUE BILL.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill H. R. 4864.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4864) to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, two questions are involved in this bill. One is the effect upon our business prosperity, the wages of our workingmen, and the welfare of our people of a given set of tariff schedules and duties on imports. The other is a much wider and deeper question and involves nothing less than a conflict between two hostile theories of government upon the outcome of which is staked the social and political fabric which embodies our modern civilization. The first question is domestic and of the gravest and most immediate importance. But it neither be-litties nor underrates it to say that it falls far short of the second in its scope and in its influence upon the fortunes of civilized man.

In what I shall say I propose to discuss the second and larger question first, for on that I think the cause in which I believe most surely rests. Protection and free trade are merely expressions in one direction of the theories of society and government which have been struggling for recognition and acceptance during this century with the control of the affairs of the civilized world as the great prize set between them. They serve, however, to illustrate and exhibit the conflict of the contending forces of which they are only the outward sign and manifestation. In examining the history of these two opposed tariff policies we are able as readily as in any other way to reach the great principles which underlie them, and of which, as I have said, they are merely one expression.

At the outset in treating of protection and free trade, it is well to clear our minds of cant. A tariff policy in its largest sense as a part of a general theory and system of government, and in its farthest results may affect a nation socially, morally, and politically; it may so modify the distribution of wealth as to give it a wider and better scope and by defending wages and standards of living may influence the whole arrangement and growth of society. On the other hand a tariff policy in the usual and narrow sense and especially from the standpoint of the free trader, is purely an economic matter, a question of the pocket, of dollars and cents, and of the national method of doing business. In this latter aspect there is nothing sacred or moral about a tariff system.

I have had the pleasure in recent years of hearing a number of persons discourse about free trade as a great moral issue. This attitude of mind has all the imperishable charm of springtime, and these same people have been very fond of likening themselves to the early Abolitionists and Free Soilers, as the forerunners and, if need be, the noble but not suffering martyrs of a great moral movement for the redemption of mankind. No one likes to lay an irreverent hand upon such beatitude as this, but it seems unavoidable to do so. There is nothing moral about the tariff question, in the narrow sense just described, nor is the morality of free trade greater than that of protection. It seems hardly necessary to quote authority on this point, but if authority is needed, we have that of the great hero of the free traders, Adam Smith. That eminent man wrote the "Wealth of Nations," a very remarkable book, containing much of great value and pointing out the pathway to be pursued by enlightened selfishness in its search for national prosperity.

That book has been widely read and greatly admired. Its author however looked upon it as covering only half of the scheme of human society and human action, for seventeen years before the publication of the "Wealth of Nations" he had written another book which was complementary to the "Wealth of Nations" and which covered what that omitted. This earlier book he entitled "Moral Sentiments." It is quite forgotten now. I have never met a free trader who had read it and very few who had heard of it. The "Moral Sentiments" have not proved as attractive as the methods of enlightened selfishness for getting rich, but the book demonstrates that Adam Smith knew that moral sentiments were not necessarily involved in a mere system of money-making and established the distinction so broadly and clearly that he was justified perhaps in hoping that his followers and worshipers would understand it.

Let us rest, then, if we need to do so, on the authority of Adam Smith, that "moral sentiments" are a thing apart from the "wealth of nations" or from tariff policies merely as such. To suppose otherwise, indeed, is as great an error as another theory which I have seen advanced, to the effect that the American manufacturer is a "robber baron," who ought to be as destitute of rights as a black man under the Dred Scott decision, while the New York importer, generally of foreign birth and often with "no fatherland but the till," is a disinterested being so pure and good that if it were not for the imperfection of our earthly state we might expect to see angel wings springing from his shoulders. The truth is that both are men with the usual supply of human nature and of enlightened selfishness about them, although I greatly prefer the American manufacturer, because his enlightened selfishness is more profitable to his own countrymen than that of the importer.

It is always well to look at things as they are, even if the thing be free trade, to which some persons in beautiful language have consecrated themselves. It is best, if we would treat it intelligently, to know that by itself and of itself the tariff is a business question and that protection and free trade only take on a different and far deeper meaning when they are considered as parts of a question between far-reaching principles, which I believe involves the future of our race and the existence and progress of the highest civilization. It is in the latter and far graver aspect, as I have already said, that I prefer first to treat them.

To the practical man of affairs the theoretical and convinced free trader is generally extremely exasperating. But to the student of history and to the disinterested observer, to men of philosophic minds and blessed with a sense of humor, he is one of the most interesting and entertaining of human phenomena. These convinced free traders generally have some education and invariably think they have a great deal. They are provided with a set of little sayings and aphorisms which can be carried without intellectual strain in a very small compass and which to their thinking are complete solutions of all social and economic questions. These they draw forth on all occasions and present them to the world with entire confidence in the finality of their little sentences and a profound contempt for all persons who venture to differ with them and who do not think that the difficulties of humanity can be so easily dealt with. Their attitude reminds one of Touchstone, who unlike them was both a wit and a humorist but who had a similar way of sententiously disposing of the troubles of mankind. Everyone remembers the description of Touchstone by the melancholy Jaques:

> And then he drew a dial from his poke;
> And looking on it with lack-lustre eye,
> Says, very wisely, "It is ten o'clock;
> "Thus we may see," quoth he, "how the world wags:
> 'Tis but an hour ago since it was nine;
> And after an hour more 'twill be eleven;
> And so, from hour to hour, we ripe and ripe,
> And then from hour to hour, we rot and rot,
> And thereby hangs a tale."

And so the free trader, not in the forest of Arden, but in the busy, eager days of the nineteenth century pulls out his little memorandum and says "The tariff is a tax," "You can not become rich by taxing yourself any more than you can lift yourself by your boot-straps," and so on, and so on. It is very interesting to know that there are men who really think that the complex affairs of humanity can be disposed of by a collection of epigrammatic half truths and watch-pocket memoranda, and who firmly believe that they can regulate the vast mechanism of modern society with a latch-key because that simple instrument suffices to open their own front doors. They are interesting also in another way, for to use the expressive slang of the day, "They know it all." The curious thing about it is that they really do know it all, if by "it" you mean free trade. It is possible for anyone to know everything about free trade, because its doctrines reached maturity fifty years ago and have stood still ever since, untaught by history and unchanged by facts.

The only condition necessary to this complete knowledge, besides being able to read, is that you should know nothing else except free trade. You must close your eyes and shut your ears to everything that has happened since the time of the Manchester school; you must take English opinion as the ultimate expression of human wisdom, and then you know all about free trade, and that is all you will know. Thus the free trader and his doctrine stand stationary and immovable. You can not affix to them Galileo's sentence, which an American wit declared to be the proper motto for Italian locomotives, "And yet it moves." There is no motion about the free trader or his doctrine. To him human wisdom culminated and found its complete expression in the free-trade measures of the Manchester school—doctrines which Thomas Carlyle irreverently christened "The Dismal Science" and the "Calico Millenium."

To the average free trader nothing has happened since. His mind is as tightly shut to new ideas or new facts as that of the average Englishman on the currency question, or as a rock barnacle at low tide. He still believes that his doctrine is not only as scientifically true as the law of gravitation, but that it is absolutely new, although it is wrinkled with age and bent by the failures of fifty years. When the astronomer, calculating the orbit of Uranus, finds perturbations for which no known conditions account, he reasons that there must be some hidden cause which is the origin of these uncalculated deviations. He observes and watches, and presently a new planet swims within his ken. His problem is solved, and he adjusts his calculations to meet the new conditions.

Not so the free trader. The orbits that he calculates are full of variations, and facts conflict with his theories. He folds his arms and says, "So much the worse for the facts if they do not conform to my doctrines." Look at anything they write or say, and you will find that they always begin by telling us what Sir Robert Peel did, what laws were passed in England from 1841 to 1846, or what Cobden said, or what were the views of the league against the corn laws. To them that was and now is both the beginning and end of all wisdom, and yet it was all a half century back. Much has happened since then; many facts have appeared which contradict all their theories; many of their prophecies have failed of fulfillment. They neither know nor care. The world has been moving steadily forward, with many struggles and much suffering, along the dusty high road of human progress ever since 1840; but the free trader, perched like a wee bird on the fence rail by the roadside, chirps and twitters his little song in bland unconsciousness of the great procession which has been marching steadily onward for fifty years in a direction quite different from that upon which the Manchester school decided that it must move.

Let us try, without prejudice and frankly confessing the enormous complexity of the social and economic difficulties which face and perplex humanity—let us try, I say, to trace the course of the movement of mankind upon the great bottom principles involved in this question, and see whether we can not get some light upon the particular phase of it which is now before us.

The breakdown of the feudal system was the defeat of the forces of separatism, disorder, and petty tyrannies. The force which prevailed over feudalism was that which made for order and the consolidation of power. Law and order were in the interests of the Crown, which was the central authority, and of the great lower and middle classes of the population, who wished peace and quiet and who preferred one ruler to many. At the same time the great feudal nobility, with all their vices, had in their day acted as an important check upon the power of the Crown, and their overthrow meant the removal of this check.

The danger to be apprehended from the destruction of the feudal system, a destruction so necessary to human progress, was that the central authority would become too powerful, and that for a tyrranous oligarchy would be substituted a personal despotism. On the continent of Europe, and in England as well, this was the line of development which followed upon the fall of the feudal system. The powers of the Crown began to grow with great rapidity, freed as they were from the resistance which the great nobles had formerly made, while the people were not ready to appreciate the situation or offer any opposition to the growth of royal power. In England the body of the people, who were by nature independent and impatient of control, soon learned their lesson. When the power of the Crown reached the point where Charles I undertook to set up a personal monarchy the people were ready for the conflict. The great rebellion ensued, and all danger of the establishment of a personal despotism in England disappeared with the execution of Charles at Whitehall and in the smoke of Cromwell's guns, when he won the "crowning mercy" at Worcester. From that period the English-speaking people everywhere have advanced steadily and with but little bloodshed to the complete control of their own Governments.

On the continent of Europe the case was widely different. There, personal despotism was established almost unchecked, and Louis XIV was able to say truthfully that he was an absolute King—that he was the state. Such a development could have but one result, and the abuses of despotism went on until no remedy remained but a social and political convulsion. This came in the French revolution, which shook the civilized world from one end to the other and plunged all Europe into war for a quarter of a century. It not only revolutionized government and society, but thought and opinion as well, and we still feel its effects. These personal governments which then were overthrown were, of course, paternal in their character; that is, they interfered with the lives and the property and the affairs of their subjects in every possible way. The physical revolt against them carried with it an intellectual revolt against state interference of any kind, and paternalism came to be regarded as the equivalent of the hideous despotisms which the French revolution destroyed.

The confusion of the two things was natural and perhaps at the time wholesome. In any event it had an immense effect upon the philosophy and theory of government, for out of this period came the doctrine that the least government is the best, and the economic theory known as laissez faire and laissez aller. The pendulum under the influence of this great movement against personal government, as was to have been expected, swung with corresponding violence to the opposite extreme. Men swiftly concluded that, because the interference of the state under the monarchies of the eighteenth century was evil, the true secret of freedom, happiness, and success was to be found in going as far as possible in the opposite direction, in reducing government to its lowest terms, and in getting as near as possible to no government at all.

In other words, the world in its political and economic theories rushed from the system of tyrannous interference by a personal government, under which it had sorely suffered, to extreme individualism and unrestrained competition as a sure haven where all would be peace, gentleness, and prosperity. All this was very natural, but like all extremes very dangerous, and like all Utopias in practice very uncertain and disappointing. The theory that state interference is always and necessarily a wholly bad thing, of which we must have as little as possible, was in reality a too hasty generalization. It depended on the proposition that state interference and paternalism as shown in the case of a personal monarchy were wholly bad. On this precise state of facts the let alone theory in politics rested, and from it the same theory in economical questions took its widest extension.

The foundation was insecure and the glittering formula soon began to break down. It could not do otherwise, for it depended on a half truth. Men began to perceive as time went on and the steady progress of the democratic movement was assured, that there was more than one kind of state, and that it did not at all follow because the meddling tyranny of a personal monarchy was bad that the limited and intelligent interference of every other kind of government must be bad too. The wide difference between the action of a state composed of Louis XIV and a state composed of the people themselves began to be apparent. In proportion as this truth has grown visible to men, so has the reaction against state interference which began at the close of the last century and culminated in the adoption of free trade by England declined.

Except to the English free trader and his imitators in this country, for whom history ended fifty years ago, and to whom the observation of historic and economic facts which do not fit their theory appears a mere impertinence, this change of opinion and advance of knowledge are very obvious. Men and nations have alike discovered that unrestrained individualism and unrestricted competition are capable of producing a social system more cruel and oppressive than the darkest forms of feudalism, to which some free-trade orators are fond of likening protection, apparently with the notion that feudalism was an economic policy. Having made this discovery men have revolted against the doctrine which denied that any relief could be obtained by invoking the strength of the whole community united in government to remedy the glaring evils and miseries which unrestricted individualism and unrestrained competition were helpless to modify or cure.

This revolt has been successful at various points, yet its importance rests not on its success, but on the fact that the let-alone theory has been proved in this way to be unsound in many directions. This fact is fatal, for if the general let-alone doctrine is not sound and correct at all points, it can not be assumed to be correct at any. It is no longer sufficient to say that any given social or economic policy rests on the let-alone theory, for that theory has broken down completely as a general truth, and therefore no part of it and no expression of it is necessarily correct.

Free trade rests entirely on the let-alone doctrine—that is, upon the doctrine that the least interference of the state is best; or in other words, that the state ought not to interfere at all in the affairs of its individual members, except to maintain order at home or abroad, or in defense of public morals and public health, and even these are logically infractions of the doctrine of absolute individualism. Free trade, comparatively speaking, is not a very large question. It is merely the expression in one limited direction of a much broader principle. If the let-alone theory is correct as a general economic principle, and if the experience and practice of mankind show that it is correct, then free trade is of course correct as one of its parts. But if, on the other hand, the let-alone doctrine can be proved in many directions to be incorrect, if it has been abandoned again and again in practice by the most civilized nations, then the presumption is against free trade or any other single expression of the central principle. Let us see, first, how far this let-alone doctrine has been invaded since it found its last expression in England a half century ago.

In the direction of free trade itself the case is very readily summed up. England has maintained that tariff system since she adopted it. France, under the Second Empire, perhaps the worst government which that country has ever had, made a spasmodic effort to imitate England's example. It was, however, quickly abandoned, and France is to-day a country of high protection. It may be added that France is the strongest country in the world, except our own and Great Britain, both financially and economically. The wealth of the people was demonstrated in a most marvelous manner when the French, out of their own savings, paid the enormous indemnity to Germany after the Franco-Prussian war, so that to-day the public debt of France is practically held by her own citizens. Without going into details, it may be said that no civilized nation has adopted the English system. All are protectionist countries.

England's own colonies, where her doctrines might be supposed to have peculiar strength, have all one after another abandoned the free-trade system and are to-day protectionist. I am quite aware that the free trader sets aside all opinion that is not English as quite worthless, but I do not think that intelligent persons who are unswayed by the provincial subservience to English opinion characteristic of most American free traders can afford to do this. The general opinion of mankind to which Jefferson appealed in the Declaration of Independence must always be regarded and has great weight in determining what men think is practically best for their respective countries. If that opinion is considered, it shows that the experience and the practice of civilized men are adverse to the let-alone doctrine as expressed in free trade.

But, as I have said already, free trade is only a part of a principle and, if free trade is founded upon the rock of everlasting truth, the doctrine of which it is the expression must hold good in every direction. Looked at in this way the practical abandonment of the theory, which is proof that it is not an economic truth and that it does not in human opinion work beneficially, is overwhelming. It is not necessary to enter into the long list of legislation, which in its very being flatly contradicts the soundness of the let-alone doctrine. A very few examples will suffice. I will take England for consideration, because England is still the great exemplar of the theory. If the let-alone theory is correct, why does England pass factory acts and mine acts? It may be said that this is done for moral or sanitary reasons, but this explanation is insufficient. It is perhaps possible to stretch it so as to cover the labor of young children, but it certainly can not cover the regulation of the hours of labor for adults. It is a monstrous invasion of the let-alone doctrine to say that it is economically correct for government to interfere with the number of hours that a man or woman should work either in mines or factories. Surely, under that doctrine people should have the right to sell their labor when and how they please. Yet the English Government is interfering in this precise direction, and the free trader does not live in England who is hardy enough to rise up and demand the repeal of these acts because they interfere with individual freedom or the doctrine on which free trade is founded.

At this very moment the English Parliament is discussing the employers liability act. Either the let-alone doctrine is radically unsound or this legislation is as gross an invasion of it as ever was attempted. On the theory of the free trader, what right has the Government to interfere between the employer and the employed? By so doing they set at naught one of their most precious shibboleths of "supply and demand." Yet the Liberal party, led until recently by the venerable statesman who believed that all financial and economic knowledge culminated fifty years ago in the Manchester school, is endeavoring to force through this very act of employers liability. What becomes of the let-alone doctrine in the Irish land legislation, where the Government takes land from the landlord and sells it to the tenant? No greater interference of government was ever undertaken, no more gaping breach in the let-alone theory was ever made—yet both political parties in Great Britain have supported or enforced in turn this land legislation of Ireland.

Let us come a little nearer to free trade. There is no form of protection so extreme as a bounty. Yet England has fostered and built up her shipping by a system of bounties, under the name of mail subsidies, which has been of the most extreme character.

I shall give elsewhere a table which shows in detail what she has done in this direction. It is enough to say here that from 1848 to 1889, inclusive, England spent in mail subsidies $190,027,789. It is perfectly idle, it is worse than begging the question, to say that these are not protective bounties because they are called mail subsidies. To pretend indeed that these subsidies are not protection in a high form is not merely a subterfuge, it is a pure falsehood. Such vast sums for such a purpose are an absurdity on any other theory. If proof were needed of their true character it may be found in the discussion which arose when under the last Administration we entered on a policy of mail subsidies and the encouragement of American steamships as an auxiliary naval force. Our measures were identical with those of England, the Republican party adopted them as measures of protection to develop our merchant marine and would not have enacted them if they had not been of that character.

All the American free traders who had been eagerly saying that England did not protect her commerce or give it bounties, that she only paid mail subsidies, cried out against our mail subsidies as another example of Republican protection. If England's mail subsidies are not protective bounties, then ours were not and they should have been cordially supported by English-minded and free-trade persons in this country. But our mail subsidies were protective and so are England's, and no one knew it so well as England, who found in our policy fresh cause for hostility to the Republican and affection for the Democratic party. The only difference between the two systems was that we honestly declared our subsidies to be protection, while England canted about hers in order that the faith of those who work in her interests in other countries might not be shaken.

If you would have further light on this, contrast what we have paid for carrying the mails with what England has paid and you will see what the actual cost of mail transportation is. The vast sums spent by England in addition to the actual cost of mail transportation are protective bounties and high at that. I think her policy in this direction has been very wise. While she maintains free trade, because she thinks it will pay, and proclaims in the name of truth and righteousness that everybody else should have free trade and open their markets to her goods because she knows that will pay, too, she is very careful to use protection in its most extreme form where she is sure that it will pay her best of all. Nothing is more laughable, it may be said in this connection, than to see the way in which the convinced American free trader is taken in by this English cant shrewdly used for business purposes. England is always talking in a strident voice about her generosity and her anxiety that other nations should adopt this or that system because it will be beneficial to them. The truth is that England as a nation is selfish, as every other nation is. She masks her selfishness in loud protestations of complete disinterestedness, but why anybody should believe these protestations who was not born in England, I have never been able to see. If, however, her general theory on which she rests free trade is correct, then her system of subsidies for steamships lines is all wrong. If the theory is incorrect, as she proves it in practice, then it does not lie in the mouth of the nation that protects commerce to talk about the eternal verity of her free-trade policy.

You can find laws in other civilized countries similar to those in England to which I have referred, but I will not dwell upon them. I will come nearer home. The public-school system and the post-office are absolute violations of the let-alone theory. Yet who disputes their value or who proposes to give them up? In almost every State of the Union there are statutes regulating the hours of labor, employers' liability, the management of railroads, and a thousand other acts great and small which interfere more or less directly with all the force of the Government in the affairs of individuals. It is the same with the nation as with the States. Our statute book is filled with provisions which utterly disregard the let-alone theory of government, and every time we dredge a harbor or deepen a river or open a canal we set it at naught.

There is no need to go on and pile up examples. They occur every day, and stare at us from every page of our constitutions and statutes. If the let-alone doctrine on which free trade rests is correct, then these laws from those providing for public education down are all wrong. They should be swept from the statute books. In the jargon of the Democratic orator, they are fetters upon freedom. They set at defiance the darling epigrams that the free trader carries in his pocket and produces year in and year out, with the comfortable belief that they are both new and true, instead of being the damaged utterances of half a century ago.

Let us look for a moment at two of these precious aphorisms, these beautiful expressions of the let-alone doctrine to the effect that you must "buy in the cheapest and sell in the dearest market," and that everything must be settled by the unrestrained and unqualified economic law of supply and demand. Let us see how these profound antitheses bear the test of actual legislation in the United States. We have upon our statute books at this moment a law to prevent the importation of contract labor, a law very imperfectly enforced I am sorry to say. What put that law upon the statute book? The demand of the laboring men of the United States that they should be protected against that form of competition. The workingmen of the United States called for and secured this legislation in order to prevent the lowering of their rates of wages by the introduction of large masses of labor, which brought with them by contract the rate of wages of other countries where wages were lower than in the United States.

On what portion of the let-alone doctrine do you rest the economic correctness of these laws supported by both political parties and questioned in their soundness by no one? If the free-trade doctrine be sound, by what principle do you step in and say to the employers of the United States, "You shall not buy your labor in the cheapest market." If that principle of buying in the cheapest market is a sound principle, it is just as applicable to a manufacturer or an employer of labor as it is to anyone else. But we properly deny them the unrestricted right because in this instance we recognize in practice that the doctrine is absurd. No grosser violation of the general principle on which free trade rests can be found than this, and yet there is not a Democrat or a free trader with any responsibility who would dare to rise in this Senate or anywhere else and ask for the repeal of these contract-labor laws. If the let-alone principle is right these laws are wrong. If these laws are right—and they are thoroughly right—then the let-alone principle is fatally wrong in that direction; and if it is wrong in one direction there is no reason to suppose that it is right in any other.

Take another case. Some years ago, in response to the workingmen of California, this country entered upon a policy of Chinese exclusion. The men who began it were denounced. The scholars, the economists, the philanthropists, the professors, the colleges at the start were all against it; but the workingmen triumphed and to-day no party and no representative of any party dares to suggest the free admission of the Chinese. I have heard free traders say that we kept out the Chinese because they were not clean and their habits were not good. Never in the world was there a great popular uprising to keep men out of a country because they were dirty or because their habits were unattractive. The trouble was that the Chinese brought with them a rate of wages with which our workingmen with their standard of living could not compete. The instinct of the laboring men of California was right. They saw in the Chinaman a competitor who would drag them down. They demanded his exclusion and we shut him out. Australia, an English colony, where the labor organizations have exercised a greater influence perhaps than anywhere in the world—Australia, too, has shut him out. How do you make it agree with the doctrine of buying in the cheapest market to exclude the Chinese labor from this country?

In China, as the cheapest labor market and the greatest reservoir of low-priced labor in the world, on the theory of free trade we should have the right to buy our labor; and yet everybody is agreed that it is well to put a stop to it by law. What becomes of the precious theory of free trade in the face of a fact like that? We are right to exclude the Chinaman, who brings his cheap labor with him and lowers our standard of living and degrades our working people. If it is right to do so, then by what theory do you admit free of duty the product of this same Chinaman made in his own country to compete with our product here? The product brings its rate of wages with it just as much as the man, and ocean freight no longer gives protection. If it is right to exclude the Chinaman, it is right to exclude the chair cane which he makes and which brings his rate of wages and standard of life to compete with our workingmen just as surely as if the Chinaman came over himself and made his chair cane in New York or Philadelphia.

The underlying proposition of the free trader is that it is idle to attempt to modify by legislation the working of immutable economic laws. He forgets, or has never learned, that scarcely anything is immutable into which enters the heart and mind and emotions of humanity. The personal equation plays a large part in all things which human beings affect by their own actions. "Raise wages by law, make yourself richer by taxation," says the free trader, bringing out again his little collection of epigrams, "It is like lifting yourselves by your boot straps." And then he fancies that he has answered the whole case. And while he thinks he has settled the universe in this simple fashion, the plain sense of the American workingmen has shut out Chinese labor and contract labor, and will in no long time shut out the imported products of that same labor.

Let us pass beyond the action of the Government in regard to the let-alone theory and consider the action of men. Let us look for a moment at the attitude of the individual man when the let-alone doctrine meets him in practice. Do workingmen wait and rely upon the operation of these so-called economic laws on which free trade rests to regulate their affairs? They combine, as they ought to combine, to bring about an increase in their wages, to elevate their own condition, to prevent by artificial means destructive competition. Every labor union that is formed flies in the face of the doctrine of free trade. But none the less men are going to form them. They wield to-day a vast power, they will keep on growing, and they exist because they represent the instinct of human nature to unite for self-protection. No free trader dares to denounce them as infractions of his theory. His theory, then, is either false or cowardly when it faces a trades union; in reality it is both.

I am aware that one wiseacre repeating what another wiseacre has said, will reply, "You admit labor free, while you cry for protection against manufactured goods." It is almost as easy to answer this statement as to make it. In the first place, it is not true that we admit all labor free. Some we exclude absolutely, like contract and Chinese labor. In the second place, the labor that we do admit free comes from Europe, and the immigrant from Europe does not bring his rate of wages with him. On the contrary, a few weeks or a few months make him as anxious for good wages as his American brethren. Our standard of living becomes his and he ceases to lower our rate of living and modes of life. The European immigrant does not bring his rate of wages with him; but the bale of goods from Europe does bring its rate of wages, and the bale of goods is not susceptible to the influences of association or to standards of living. The bale of goods brings its rate of wages with it and keeps it, and works in that way towards the lowering of all American rates.

Lastly, it is no argument to say that because you do not have protection in one direction where it would be good you should give it up in another where it is also good. So I freely admit that our failure to give suitable protection against the labor which comes in the human being is a grave defect. The principle embodied in the contract-labor law should be enlarged, because the protection we now give by the duty on the bale of goods should be extended. There is no greater need at this time than stringent laws to sift and restrict the immigration to this country for the protection of our rates of wages and of the quality of our citizenship. This protection against excessive European immigration will come as the exclusion of the Chinese and contract labor came, from the good sense and unerring instinct of the people, which will lead them to measures to guard their homes, their future, their race, and their civilization against forms of competition which they can not meet if it is left unrestricted.

What, then, becomes of a doctrine which all the legislatures in the world continually evade? What becomes of a doctrine with a hundred violations staring it in the face from every statute book, violations which even its devotees support or accept? What becomes of a doctrine that the instinct of mankind in his efforts for improvement sets at naught? All history proves that the let-alone doctrine can not stand the shock of facts or the ordeal of practice. The truth is that in these modern times the civilized world is entering upon a new period. The temperate zone, in which experience shows that the most highly civilized races to which we belong can alone thrive and multiply, is very nearly absorbed. If there is still much to be converted to the uses of man, the limits are well within sight. Over against us are the crowded masses of the tropics. Relieved in many instances by the rule of our superior races from the effect of the wars, famines, and floods which formerly decimated them, they are multiplying with enormous rapidity.

In Natal, for example, when the English first took possession, the proportion of blacks to whites was something like 3 to 1. To-day, under the strong British rule, and after a large British immigration, the blacks are to the whites as 13 to 1. The same rule holds good everywhere, and the crowded masses of the tropical regions are becoming ever more crowded. They have standards far below ours. They live under conditions of climate and habits impossible to us. Millions of men in India subsist on from fourteen to twenty dollars a year, and those men in India as well as in Japan are beginning to manufacture, thus closing to us their own markets and threatening our markets with an industrial competition which is deadly if you do not shut it out. You may lower wages and reduce costs beyond the wildest dreams of the free-trade orator, and in this temperate zone, where we and those like us dwell, you never can meet that tropical standard of living.

Are we to sit down with our great civilization and bring about free trade in order to be gradually overwhelmed by the labor of the tropics after a desperate struggle with the overcrowded people of our own race in Europe? Are we to be told that the laws of supply and demand, of buying in the cheapest and selling in the dearest markets are eternal truths and that everything would be right if we only adhered to them? Are we to accept these shattered dogmas of fifty years ago and yield without a struggle to the ruin of our labor and the degradation of our standards of living?

Very fortunately there is a sound instinct in the great races who have made civilization, which protects them from such visions as these. They will not submit; they have already begun to resist. They have excluded the Chinaman from Australia and the United States. They will exclude every sort of low labor brought by the man himself and they will in process of time equalize that same labor with their own by proper duties when it is brought down the ship's gangway, not in the form of a human being but in the form of a bale of goods and carrying the same low rate of wages. The law of self-preservation is a higher law than any that political economy has ever invented, and, although it is the outcome of human nature, it is immutable. That law will in the lapses of the years, if not now, give us the protection which the free trader playing with his wrinkled little puppets would deny.

The fundamental error of the supporters of the let-alone theory, as I have already said, is that they believe that what they call economic laws are fixed and certain, like those which govern the motions of the stars. But, although men like stars may differ from one another in glory, they are unlike stars in most other respects. Laws which are grounded upon the action of humanity are not fixed, but empirical. With rare exceptions, the most that we can hope for in this field is an approximation, some general rule with many exceptions. Human policies of society or government are subject to infinite variations. That which is most wise at one time may be most unwise at another. That which is excellent for one people would be ruin to another. Soil, climate, situation, the size of the country, the race and character of the people, the conditions of the moment, and the possibilities of the future must all be considered in the adoption of any policy. The States and the people who have recognized this great controlling truth and have put a priori theories behind them, have been the successful and governing races of the world.

The Abbé Sieyès drew one ideal constitution after another for France. They were all perfect in theory and they all perished from the face of the earth. Washington and his associates made but one constitution. It embodied few theories and much practice. It had inconsistencies and compromises, but it met the wants of the time and of the people, and it has stood strong and flourishing for a hundred years. The free trader is like the French Abbé; he would bind human development in the tight bandages of a theory without regard to the infinite complexity of all things pertaining to humanity. He may by so doing attain symmetry, but it will be the symmetry of the Egyptain mummy and the result will be quite as lifeless. That which applies to constitutions and government applies also to economic policies. We must look for guidance not to closet theories, but to the great book of history and experience and see what has been done and attempted and what results have been achieved.

Men are learning the lessons of history. They have long since put those lessons into practice. They are now beginning to formulate them as a theory and to understand the philosophy which underlies them. It is apparent to all whose eyes are not hermetically sealed by the traditions of a fading past that, because a personal monarchy or state socialism is bad and oppressive, it does not therefore follow that unrestrained individualism and unrestricted competition are always and everywhere the only good things. Because some state interference is hurtful, all forms of it are not necessarily so. It is a question of degree, not of kind. Somewhere between the extremes of unlimited individualism on the one hand and personal monarchy or state socialism on the other can be found the golden mean in which it is possible to use the united power of the community expressed in the state for the benefit of mankind and the protection of civilization.

Just how far we can go profitably in the use or in the refusal to use the powers of the state can be determined only by patient and cautious experiment through which all the slow steps of civilization have been thus far painfully won. It is no doubt true that it is a grievous mistake to suppose that we can cure by law every evil which afflicts humanity and that it is a weakness to look helplessly to legislation for everything we desire. But it is equally true, and has been proved in practice, that legislation and government can in many cases be employed with advantage to help the affairs of men.

In other words, the aggregate power of the community can sometimes bring beneficial results which individuals by their divided efforts can never reach. If it be said, as it always is said, that this is a futile attempt to overbear natural laws by artificial devices, the answer is that the so-called economic laws are neither natural nor final; that statute law can often modify or call into action economic laws, and is constantly doing so, and that the whole fabric of human civilization to which those supposed laws are thought to apply is artificial. If we put away from us everything that is artificial, everything which man has established by means of law and custom, we should sink back to the condition of the men of the caves and the river drift.

> As we see those animals whose instinct compels them to live in society and obey a chief are most capable of improvement, so it is with races of mankind. Whether we look at it as a cause or a consequence, the more civilized always have the most artificial governments. In Tierra del Fuego, until some chief shall arise with power sufficient to secure any acquired advantage, such as the domesticated animals, it seems scarcely possible that the political state of the country can be improved.—Voyage of the Beagle, volume 1, page 206.

These are the words of Charles Darwin, a very great man, and one who has exercised a more profound influence upon human thought than probably any man who has lived in the nineteenth century. He marks here as characteristic of savages in the very lowest scale of humanity an absolutely unrestrained individualism, and points out that all civilization is highly artificial. Speaking with the unimpassioned voice of science, he formulates a great truth.

Everything that we have which makes up our civilization is the outcome of custom hardened into law and public opinion, or of law, pure and simple, embodying the aspirations and the hopes of men. Government and property, the sanctity of the family, the bonds of marriage, the education of children, the punishment of crimes, are all artificial, the slow upbuilding by man through ages of weary experiment and disheartening failures. From the most sacred rights of humanity to trivial questions of manners and of dress, all is artificial; all is the work of man's brains seeking to do by the concentrated force of society what the poor scattered atoms of individuals could never accomplish alone.

In view of the marvelous work which men by their union with other men have been able to achieve, how pitiful is a doctrine which would hold that this united force, which has raised us slowly from the deep darkness of prehistoric times, must be reduced to its lowest proportions and that the less we employ the agency which has raised us, the agency of the united force of a nation or community, the better it will be for us. How more than absurd to stand in the midst of civilization, the work of our hands, artificial throughout, created by men acting in large masses and represented by States and governments, and say that the laws of that civilization made in this way and with such a history demand the entire negation and abandonment of the very power which created the entire fabric, merely because that power is capable of abuse and can be forced to an evil extreme like personal despotism or state socialism.

It is a marvel that such a doctrine should have had any measure of success for fifty years even in theory, for it has never been accepted, except in a small degree, by any people in practice. Men have always employed their united force, which for convenience we call the State, sometimes wisely, sometimes unwisely, to secure or to try to secure ends for which their individual strength was unequal. There has never been a time when they have not done so. There never will be, for the instinct which first united a band of naked savages for mutual defense is undying, and is as strong to-day as ever and far more intelligent. The let-alone theory, as a complete guide, when tried by the broad history of man, fails utterly. It has no support. Tried even by the standards of the limited application of it attempted in this century in new directions, it fails and can have no other fate, for it gives the lie to all that men have done and suffered in order to reach the point they have now attained and sets at naught all the teachings of history.

If, then, as I have said, the general doctrine breaks down, no single expression of it can stand except on its own merits. The general doctrine of let-alone in government has been invaded, abandoned, and disproved in hundreds of cases even since it reached its highest point fifty years ago. Free trade is one expression of the let-alone doctrine. The general theory can not sustain it. It must, therefore, stand on its own merits alone as one expression of a principle broken at a hundred points, and must prove by the benefits it confers, its right to exist as an exception to the great law of human development through which all civilization has been reached.

The next point, therefore, is to determine whether free trade, contrary as it is to the general principles on which human society has been built up, can justify its existence. We can settle this by examining the results of free trade, and, as only one civilized country has adopted it, that is easily done.

England took up free trade, not because she was suddenly convinced of its scientific truth and believed that it ought therefore to prevail, even if the heavens fell. She adopted it, as nations generally adopt an economic policy, because she was satisfied after much discussion that it would pay. It is important to us to know under what conditions she adopted it, whether our conditions are like hers, and whether in the long run free trade has proved such a benefit to England as to make it obvious that it must be beneficial to every other nation.

First, as to the conditions. England is a small country with a limited agricultural area and no great variety of natural resources. The United States is a very large country with an enormous agricultural area and an almost unequalled variety of natural resources. The population of England fifty years ago was dense. It is still more so to-day. The population of the United States at large, tried by European standards, is sparse. Thus we see at the outset that the natural conditions and those of population also in England and the United States are wholly different.

At the time of the free-trade movement England had been living and had built up her industries and her merchant marine under a system of high protection, which had endured for centuries. All the industries practically which she could hope to have were firmly established and the skilled labor necessary to carry them on had been developed. We, on the other hand, have had protection of a varying kind and with some large intervals of low tariff for less than a century. Many of our industries are not yet firmly established nor the necessary labor for them fully developed, and many others to the flourishing existence of which there are no natural obstacles do not exist at all. England invented the steam engine, and in 1840 had carried the application of steam power to industrial production far beyond the point reached at that time by any other nation. This lead in the application of steam power gave her an enormous advantage in cheapness of production and put her far beyond the reach of competition. We to-day have no such advantage, for the application of steam power to industrial production is now at the equal command of all the great civilized nations.

The most important difference, however, still remains to be considered. England to-day and fifty years ago was unable to feed herself. She was obliged to import food products or starve her people. At the same time she had corn laws, which levied a heavy tax on the great food staples. This tax, for, as I shall presently show, it was not a protective duty, benefited only the land owners of England, a small and in the main an aristocratic and very rich class. It put a heavy burden upon all the people of England and especially upon the industrial classes. The great popular agitation, which ended with the establishment of free trade, began in the attack on the corn laws and at the time the repeal of the corn laws was regarded as the leading feature of the free-trade movement. In reality that repeal was demanded and would be demanded to-day as part of the policy of protection.

The protectionist theory is to discriminate by duties in favor of every article which can be grown or manufactured in the protected country in sufficient quantities for the use of the people, and everything which can not be grown or manufactured in sufficient quantities according to the protectionist should be placed upon the free list. Corn could not be raised in England in sufficient quantities to feed her people. There was no ground for giving a bounty as has been done so largely by European nations to stimulate the production of sugar, for it was a physical impossibility to raise corn and wheat beyond certain well-defined limits. A certain proportion of food products had to be imported and, as the importation could not be avoided, there was no possibility of lowering the prices by developing a home competition, and the duties imposed became a direct tax which no one could escape.

Therefore, according to the protectionist theory, better understood to-day than it was then, the English corn laws ought to have been swept away long before it was actually done. There is no defense for their existence in protection. If it is possible to defend a tax upon food products which can not be raised in the country in sufficient quantities for its needs, that defense is not to be found in protection, but in free trade, which in England to-day taxes coffee and tea. Hence it follows that the repeal of the corn laws, which established free trade in England, has absolutely no bearing on the question now before us, except as an example of the soundness of the protectionist theory. Moreover it must be remembered that we are in no way dependent as England was on outside supplies of food products. We not only raise all we need and all we ever shall be likely to need, but we are large exporters.

There is still another side to this matter, which must not be passed over, as it has an important bearing upon the action of England. The English manufacturer had reached the point where the miseries of the industrial population were such that it was necessary either to raise wages or run the risk of revolution, which was foreshadowed in the Chartist movement. The English manufacturer raised wages by repealing the corn laws, and thus cheapening the food supply. It was an easy matter to excite popular feeling against the corn laws, for there never was a subject so susceptible of successful popular agitation. The class against which it was directed and which benefited by the corn laws was unpopular, numerically small, and, although still powerful, was so crippled politically by the reform bill of 1832 that it could not oppose a successful resistance.

The manufacturer raised his wages at the expense of the English landowner. The industrial population was directly benefited. The manufacturer was not obliged to increase wages out of his own pocket, and the farmer and the agricultural laborer were no worse off, because the corn laws were not protective duties to them and they received none of the benefit which accrued to the comparatively few landowners of England. The manufacturers having carried their point on the corn laws and with a full sense of the advantage of their position owing to centuries of protection and to their early application of steam power, were not only ready but willing to remove all other duties, believing that their home market was safe and that free trade would give a wider circulation and hence an increased value to their products.

Thus it was that the manufacturers of England with practical unanimity petitioned Parliament for the removal of all protective duties. These English manufacturers did not take this step because they thought that a scientific truth ought to prevail, but because they believed it to be for their own best interests in the direction of a money profit. Their opinion deserved to be and was regarded by Parliament. Contrast their attitude with that of our own manufacturers to-day. Our manufacturers with practical unanimity favor protection, and are opposed to free trade, and their opinion ought to be regarded by us as of great importance in the wisest business settlement of this question. The reply to this always is that our manufacturers sustain protection because they are selfish and make money by it. It is undoubtedly true that the manufacturer sustains protection because he hopes to make money. That is the object of business, and the number of persons who are in business with any other purpose is, I think, extremely small. If, however, the American manufacturer does not make money it is quite certain that he will not employ labor, and therefore the workingmen will not make money either. Our manufacturers believe that under free trade they must either go out of business or reduce labor costs. They naturally do not care to do the former, for that is ruin, and they are very unwilling to try the latter, because reducing labor costs means lowering wages, which means in turn vast industrial disturbances; and that is ruin too, or something very near it. How widely different is our situation to-day from that of England fifty years ago, so far as the manufacturers are concerned. Most striking of all these differences, moreover, is the fact that while the English Parliament listened to English manufacturers, a majority of the American Congress not only turns a deaf ear to American manufacturers, but treats them as if they were enemies of their country.

Having found that the conditions in England at the time of the adoption of free trade were wholly unlike our conditions here to-day, it now remains to inquire whether the English policy has produced results which make it beyond question the proper policy for every other country.

After the adoption of free trade those who brought it about immediately proclaimed, in the fashion of the English when they have entered upon some scheme which they think profitable, that the new scheme was a great and eternal truth; that every other nation ought to adopt it; that everyone who did not agree with them was either vicious or ignorant, and probably both. This outcry had but little effect upon other nations, but in the United States there is a class of persons who are still intellectually in the colonial stage of development and who are sadly distressed by any disagreement with the views of England. Hence has arisen among us a free-trade propaganda. It was sustained at first by the existence of slave labor, which condemned a large section of our country to the production of a single great staple, and which, where it flourished, checked all industrial development. With the fall of slavery the gospel of free trade passed out of sight, and only in late years has regained its lost ground. But now that, sustained by a desire for sectional retaliation, it again has a political standing, we have a right to demand, when it asks us to imitate the British policy, an exhibition of British results.

I have referred to the acclamation with which the adoption of free trade was hailed in England. The clamor grew so loud that it seemed as if one general feeling of delight and satisfaction pervaded the whole people. The classes who were directly benefited, or thought they were benefited, by free trade were loudly vocal, while the masses were silent. Yet with all this apparent unanimity, one of the greatest men then living in England, unbribed by mercantile profits, unawed by the noise of Birmingham and Manchester, and looking with prescient eyes beyond the passing day, announced to the unheeding world about him that there was no divine salvation in free trade. Here is what Thomas Carlyle said in the very heyday of the Manchester school, and his words may well be pondered, as showing how far short the new movement came even at that moment of fulfilling its promises:

> The world, with its Wealth of Nations, Supply and Demand, and such like, has of late days been terribly inattentive to that question of work and wages. We will not say the poor world has retrograded even here; we will say rather, the world has been rushing on with such fiery animation to get work and ever more work done, it has had no time to think of dividing the wages; and has merely left them to be scrambled for by the law of the stronger, law of supply and demand, law of laissez faire, and other idle laws and un-laws, saying, in its dire haste to get the work done, "That is well enough."—Past and Present, page 26.
> All this dire misery, therefore; all this of our poor workhouse workmen, of our chartisms, trade strikes, corn laws, Toryisms, and the general downbreak of laissez faire in these days—may we not regard it as a voice from the dumb bosom of nature, saying to us; "Behold, supply and demand is not the one law of nature; cash payment is not the sole nexus of man with man—how far from it. Deep, far deeper than supply and demand, are laws, obligations, sacred as man's life itself; these also, if you will continue to do work, you shall now learn and obey. He that will learn them, behold Nature is on his side, he shall yet work and prosper with noble rewards. He that will not learn them, nature is against him, he shall not be able to do work in Nature's sempire—not in hers. Perpetual mutiny, contention, hatred, isolation, execration, shall wait on his footsteps, till all men discern that the thing which he attains, however golden it look to be, is not success, but the want of success."—Past and Present, page 232.

> With our present system of individual Mammonism and government by laissez faire this nation can not live. And if in the priceless interim some new life and healing be not found, there is no second respite to be counted on. The shadow on the dial advances thenceforth without pausing. What government can do? This, that they call "organizing labor" is, if well understood, the problem of the whole future, for all who will in future pretend to govern men.—Past and Present, page 318.

England has many more doubters of the truth of free trade now than she had then. If Thomas Carlyle were to come back to life, instead of crying in the wilderness against the "calico millenium," he would find many allies even in his native land. Among others no less a person than a late prime minister of England, Lord Salisbury, who has not hesitated to sneer in public at the dogmas of free trade. And if Carlyle were to look across the North Sea to the land of one of his heroes, he would find another German, Prince Bismarck, worthy to stand by the side of the great Frederick, declaring that the prosperity of the United States was largely due to the policy of protection, and himself embodying that policy in the legislation of the mighty empire which he has created.

According to the Manchester school free trade was to become straightway universal, and was to bring in the place of war peace on earth and good will among men. Free trade has not become universal, for no nation but England has adopted it, and England herself has had a war on her hands on an average of about once a year ever since. As prophets of peace and universal free trade the Manchester school has been a failure.

Let us turn now to the immediate effect upon England. That the repeal of the corn laws, which was in accordance with protectionist theories, was of great benefit to the English industrial population can not be questioned. But the important point is to know whether free trade by itself has been able to maintain wages and to keep the working people of England more contented and better provided than they are elsewhere.

On this subject I propose to quote the testimony of Mr. J. C. Fielden before the royal commission on the precious metals in 1887. Mr. Fielden is a peculiarly valuable witness, for he is an expert on the subject of labor, a free trader, and attributes the facts to which he testifies solely to the currency question. Mr. Fielden went into a cotton mill at 13 years of age, and in 1887 he had been connected with the cotton trade for thirty-six years. He is a cotton manufacturer, the manager of a large mercantile business in Manchester, has been connected with all movements in the cotton districts among the working classes since 1859, and has also been the arbitrator for the operatives in all the great wage questions where the question has been settled by arbitration. I now give some extracts from his testimony showing the condition of wages and labor in England in 1887:

7349. CHAIRMAN. You mean the present selling prices of these companies, compared with what was put into them?

Answer. Not only the present selling price; they are nearly all at a discount, some of them at a very considerable discount; but the average yearly dividends are only about 1 per cent during ten years, and during this time some very large dividends have been paid in Bombay out of the work that should be done in Oldham, because they are very much better and cheaper producers in Oldham than in Bombay.

7645-7646. This second report is a report made by Mr. John Fielding, secretary of the Operatives Spinners' Provincial Association, Bolton: "Wages," he says, "or rather prices, in every department of a spinning mill have been reduced 15 per cent since 1874, and stand at that point to-day. Generally speaking, the mills have been kept on full time during this period, except in 1879, 1885, and 1886, when short time and total stoppage were resorted to in a great many instances. Until 1880 none but loafers need be out of work many weeks together, but since then work has gradually been more difficult to obtain, and it is quite common for a spinner to be out of employment twelve, eighteen, and even twenty-four months at a spell. Work was never so bad to find as at present." Bolton is the chief center of fine spinning. It governs practically the whole of the fine spinning trade.

I come next to the coarse, which is the spinning most affected, and heavy coarse counts. The mills spinning coarse counts of yarn are so scattered about in every little village that there is scarcely any large town from which a return could be had of any value as representative of the state of this branch of spinning. But I may state that no branch of the cotton trade has suffered more. Mills engaged in this business can be had at almost any price. You can have a mill to-day and I can sell a mill to-day at one-twentieth part of its cost. That is, a mill engaged in the manufacture of these counts and working now.

7654. Q. What age would the mill be?

A. A good mill in working order at the present time. The valleys running through Rossendale, Todmorden, and Hebden Bridge have, with rare exceptions, been practically ruined so far as capital is concerned, and in addition the want of employment has been most severely felt during the past twelve years throughout these districts. In fact, it is as if a simoon had swept over these valleys. You can see mill after mill with the roof off, never having been turned around for years; and as to the state of the operatives, there are some of the finest operatives in the kingdom in these valleys, they have had to disperse portions of their families in all directions.

7655. Q. Then has the population diminished?

A. Yes, I have no doubt, if you get the population returns of the whole of the district from Waterfoot, Bacup, up to Todmorden and Hebden Bridge. Perhaps the wealthiest firm of cotton manufacturers in the world is at Todmorden, and with the exception of one other firm in Todmorden, every other concern has been swept away, has had to compound or go out of business. Some of them have compounded two or three times; this refers to firms who were in business before 1874.

7682. His returns of the unemployed were (quoting Mr. R. Knight, general secretary of the boiler-makers and iron shipbuilders):

1879	89	1883	115
1874	223	1884	2,946
1875	607	1885	7,197
1887	170	1886	6,480

7686. Q. Does that cover all the trades in Wolverhampton?

A. It does practically. He gives a general description of how bad they are first, and then he goes on to say that "wages have been reduced in the building trades 4s. 6d. per week during the last ten years." That is a considerable reduction. He says, "In the tin-plate trades wages have been reduced by a process of discounts" that is, taking a discount of wages, so much per cent off his list prices of work; "locksmiths are the same, only the trade is worse. The average wages of a locksmith will not exceed from 12s. to 14s. per week, and not that for fifty-two weeks in the year." In the coal and iron trades things are worse now than they ever were, so far as wages go. Well, of course, I need not mention the case of the chain-makers—which is worse than slavery; it is, as far as wages go, about 6s. or 8s. a week for men and women—and the nailworkers of the district, embodying about 30,000 people. Putting these two trades together, the average wages for a long day's work is about 1s. to 13d. and 14d. a day. He says: "In the iron trade, millmen, who roll the iron into sheets for galvanizing, are about the best off for trade, but I believe their wages are regulated by either the selling prices of iron, or by the pudlers' wages." Then he goes on to compositors: "Compositors have had a reduction of about 10 per cent during the last two years. Shoemakers are pretty fair for trade, but prices have gone down. I can not give any figures of the number employed in the various trades, as I have no means of obtaining the statistics in the limit of time.

"The number of unemployed is far in excess of what it was ten years back and although it is not so bad, the number is increasing. There are also a considerable number on short time. This information in greater part I obtained from a member of the Burslem school board. It applies to the principal branches of the pottery trade."

7700. The report of Mr. John Weir, of the Fife and Clackmannan Miners' Association, says: "In 1874 our men were earning between 6s. and 7s. per day. At present they are only getting between 3s. and 4s. I could not venture a comparative statement as to employment."

7955. (Mr. Chaplain.) Q. I think you said last time that the population was growing four times as fast as employment.

A. In Lancashire, in the cotton districts.

981. Q. Of course, you are aware that quite apart from any currency questions there are other causes which are suggested may have contributed to that, such as increase of industrial activity in Germany, and of late years greatly increased activity in America, too, and consequently more competition?

A. Well, I have paid a very great amount of attention to foreign competition and I may say this, that we have never had a successful competitor in a neutral market for the cotton trade before this silver difficulty. Germany may manufacture under her tariffs, the United States may manufacture under their tariffs; that is the point to consider. The United States, like India, grow their own cotton, but they are obliged to protect themselves by a 35 per cent duty against our goods or else we should invade them completely.

8003. Q. Amounting I think you said to 700,000 or 900,000 unemployed out of 9,000,000 employed altogether?

A. My estimate of 700,000 is based on the strict proportion of the ten societies put in; but at the trades conference at Wolverhampton the delegates representing all the principal trades estimated those out of work at 900,000, and I think they are very much nearer right than I am.

8004. In the case of commodities the wholesale fall does not represent the retail benefit, and I say also that upon a large proportion of the expenditure there has been no economy whatever, and that therefore the actual reductions and loss in wages that have taken place are fully equivalent to any cheapening of commodities to them. That is my case as far as the workingmen are concerned.

8005. Q. It practically comes to this, that on the balance you think the working class are the losers?

A. I think on the balance they are the losers, and I think, to show this clearly, that on considering the question for the working classes, whenever you consider cheapness, which is a very important thing, you must also consider that employment is much more important. Cheapness is a very important thing, but employment is more important.

From Mr. Fielden's testimony, drawn as it is from the secretaries of the great labor organizations and from manufacturers, and which can not be questioned, we find that during the last twenty years there has been a serious decline in wages in England, amounting to from 12 to 15 per cent, and a large falling off in business. In this country, during the same period, the Aldrich report shows that there has been an advance in industrial wages of about 14 per cent. Mr. Fielden attributes the decline in England to the demonetization of silver, which on his theory affected wages and prices all over the world. Yet our wages, assuming that Mr. Fielden is correct in his theory, despite this currency difficulty, which was pushing them downward all the time, nevertheless rose 14 per cent.

Thus we see that if it is the abandonment of silver which has forced down wages and prices, free trade was helpless to resist the decline, while in the United States protection was able not only to resist the adverse force, but to keep wages on an ascending scale. During the debates of last summer many free traders who were eagerly supporting the gold standard claimed that it had not lowered prices, because wages in the United States had been rising since 1873. They are therefore estopped from now denying the fact of the rise. On the other hand, the friends of silver met this argument, drawn from our increasing wages, by saying that they formed an exception to the general decline on account of the labor organizations and the protective tariff, both infractions of the let-alone theory on which free trade rests.

If, however, we assume that Mr. Fielden's theory as to the cause of the decline is incorrect, and that it had nothing to do with the state of the currency, then we find that during the last twenty years English wages have gone down 15 per cent under free trade, while American wages have risen 14 per cent under protection. It makes no difference whether we accept Mr. Fielden's view as to silver or deny with the gold monometallist that silver had anything to do with the general decline of wages in England. So far as the question of free trade or protection is concerned, the result is the same and in favor of protection. If silver caused declining wages the statistics show that protection was able to resist the decline. If silver had nothing to do with the decline in wages then, according to statistics, wages have been rising for twenty years past under American protection and falling under English free trade.

I will not bring forward any additional testimony in support of the evidence of Mr. Fielden. There is no need to do so. The general facts more than sustain all the details. The London dock strike of a few years ago, followed as it was last summer by the strike of 300,000 miners, against a reduction of wages, demonstrates the continued decline of wages in England. No general decline of wages took place in the United States until the protective tariff was threatened with destruction. Most significant of all is the fact that the stream of immigration flows from England to the United States. English immigrants come here to better their condition, and the instinct which leads them to do so is conclusive proof that the people who live by wages know them to be higher in protected America than in free-trade England. Thus we see that in fifty years free trade has proved utterly unable to maintain wages in England, much less to increase them. At this point, also, free trade as a practical system has broken down.

Turn from industry to agriculture. Has English agriculture benefited by free trade, as Cobden and others of his school predicted? It is a matter of public notoriety that the record of agriculture in England of late years is little but a record of disaster. It is estimated that 2,500,000 acres of land have been driven out of cultivation. Rents have fallen from 30 to 50 per cent and the market value of farming land has decreased in like proportion. In 1862 England grew 17,000,000 quarters of wheat, and in 1892, 7,000,000 quarters. Within six months the landowners and farmers of Essex have been obliged to reduce the wages of their laborers to 8s. a week. How would our farmers and farm laborers like to live on $104 a year? But of course, according to the free trader, the agricultural laborers go into some more profitable employment. Let us see how they go, and where:

The London Truth says:

A vast number of agricultural laborers found it difficult to get work and so became coal-miners. In 1886 there were 619,105 miners; in 1892 there were 903,000. In order that this large number should find work the working days of the week, were reduced, with a consequent reduction of wages.

To this movement of labor from the field to the mines the great coal strike of last summer was the terrible answer. This is what would happen here if our industrial wage-earners were forced out of their present position by increased foreign importations on to the lands or into the mines. It is not a pleasant picture to contemplate, and yet a great party in this country is actually struggling to bring it about. But in England, while her newspapers are urging us to adopt free trade and her manufacturers, like Mr. Fielden, are waiting breathlessly to rush into our markets, some Englishmen are once more recalling the words of one of England's great prime ministers, uttered to deaf ears in the hour of the free-trade triumph.

On the third reading of the repeal bill in 1846, Mr. Disraeli said:

It may be vain now, in the midnight of their intoxication, to tell them there will be an awakening to bitterness. It may be idle now, in the springtide of their economic frenzy, to warn them that there will be an ebb of trouble. But the dark and inevitable hour will arrive; then, when their spirit is softened by misfortune, they will recur to those principles which made England great, and in our belief can alone keep England great. They may then perchance remember, not with unkindness, those who, betrayed and deserted, were neither ashamed nor afraid to struggle for the good old cause—the cause with which are associated principles the most popular, sentiments the most utterly national—the cause of labor, the cause of the people, the cause of England.

Nothing remains but the free-trade promise to increase trade. From official figures, which I will give in detail in a table, I will show the percentage of increase in English exports from decade to decade since 1830. I will also place by the side of this table a similar one showing the percentage of increase in American exports during the same period:

Decade.	Increase of exports over preceding decade.
	English.	American.
	Per cent.	Per cent.
1820–1830
1830–1840	25.0	68.0
1840–1850	38.1	20.3
1850–1860	88.8	95.2
1860–1870	39.3	8.7
1870–1880	26.5	129.0
1880–1890	5.5	39.7
Average increase	42.2	58.5
Average increase, excluding 1860–1870		66.4

These tables, which exhibit accurately the volume of trade, require but little comment. It must be remembered in considering them that the principal argument of the free trader is that by his system we shall expand trade and increase the volume of exports, thereby widening the circulation of our products, and thus stimulate and enlarge production. A glance at these tables shows that the average rate of increase in British exports during six decades was 42.2 per cent, while for the same decades (five of which were under a high and one under a low tariff, but none under absolute free trade) the average rate of increase in the exports of the United States was 58.5 per cent. In these six decades I have included the war decade from 1860 to 1870, which was of course wholly abnormal and ought not to be included in getting the true average increase. Excluding the war decade, the average increase of exports from the United States by decades since 1830 is 68.4 per cent against 42.2 per cent in free-trade England.

In other words, on the most vital point made by the free trader we find that under protection the United States has beaten England over 25 per cent in the rate of increase in exports. What becomes of the free trader's promises, that by his system we are to get larger markets and wider circulation for our products, when for sixty years we have increased our exports under protection so much more rapidly than free-trade England? If we can increase our exports more rapidly under protection than England can hers under free trade, how absurd it is to ask us to adopt free trade in order to enlarge our market. It will also be observed from these tables that the decline in English exports has been steady since the decade from 1850 to 1860, when all trade was so enormously stimulated by the gold discoveries of California and Australia, and that during the last decade all increase has practically ended.

I will now give a series of tables showing how England raises her revenue. I will not pause to comment upon them. Anyone who will take the trouble to examine them can see how much more the English methods of raising revenue burden the poorer classes of the population than our methods do under our existing system:

PAUPERS IN THE BRITISH EMPIRE, AND WHAT IT COSTS TO MAINTAIN THEM.

The total number of paupers in England, Wales, Ireland, and the Kingdom of Scotland is 979,440. (Twenty-eight persons in every one thousand are paupers.) Population, 35,000,000.

One person in every twelve needs relief to keep him from starvation. In London two persons out of every nine die in the workhouse or other public institutions. In Manchester one out of every five.

The cost to maintain the paupers of Great Britain for the past year was $46,273,915.

The London Christian says:

One out of every two laboring men over 60 years of age comes under the law.

PAUPERS IN THE UNITED STATES.

The number of paupers in the United States is 97,205 (one and one-half persons in every one thousand). Population, 62,000,000.

Mr. John Morley, secretary for Ireland, in addressing the Amalgamated Society of Engineers at Newcastle in May, 1889, declared: "It is an awful fact—it is really not short of awful—that in this country, with all its wealth, its vast resources, and all its power, 45 per cent—that is to say, nearly one-half of the persons who reach the age of 60—are or have been paupers."

What, then, do we find in the experience of Great Britain or in the condition of her population under free trade to warrant our making the vast industrial change with which we are threatened? We not only do not get anything to show that the change must be obviously and surely beneficial, but, on the contrary, all the evidence points strongly the other way.

We find that their natural conditions are wholly different from ours, that no other civilized nation has adopted the British system, and that even her own colonies have abandoned it. We find that England does not hesitate to apply protection where she thinks it profitable. She gives vast subsidies, which are protective bounties, to her shipping. She has just imposed import duties in India, but she has excepted cotton goods and yarns, nearly half the imports, thus giving a protective discrimination in those vast possessions in favor of the Lancashire mills, proving in this way that her eagerness to have other nations adopt free trade is simply that she may have markets which are now closed to her. We have found also that wages have been declining in England under free trade during a period of twenty years. By the tables of exports we learn that exports increase faster under American protection than under British free trade.

We see from other statistics that she has 28 paupers to every 1,000 against 1½ in the United States. We know that the stream of emigration flows from England to the United States; we know in one word that wages are better here, the standard of living higher, and the opportunities of life larger than in England. All this we are asked to abandon in order to try the free-trade system, which the British Colonies have thrown aside, and about the merit of which England herself is hesitating to-day. If we make such a change Hamlet's reproach might well be made to us: "Could you on this fair mountain leave to feed, and batten on this moor?"

Such in outline have been the history and results of free trade in the only country which has adopted it. Let us see now what it promises and what rewards it offers when it asks for adoption in the United States. No one will deny that under protection, and especially during the last thirty years, this country has enjoyed a great prosperity, and that its progress and material development have been little short of marvelous. When we are asked to lay aside a system under which we have been so successful the inducement ought to be very great and the reward very sure. In coming to a decision so momentous and a change so far reaching, we ought to understand well what we are to gain by it. Free trade, as its name implies, makes trade of the first importance as a condition of natural wealth and prosperity. It starts, therefore, with a misconception.

Dr. Johnson, who was not an economist, but who had a great deal of robust common sense, said once to Boswell:

Depend upon it this rage of trade will destroy itself. You and I shall not see it, but the time will come when there will be an end of it. Trade is like gaming. If a whole company are gamesters the play must cease, for there is nothing to be won. When all nations are traders, there is nothing to be gained by trade, and it will stop first where it is brought to the greatest perfection. Then the proprietors of land only will be great men.

No one would think of quoting Dr. Johnson as an authority on political economy, and his vigorous statements generally ran, as in this instance, to extremes. Yet none the less his strong sense of the relation of things has here grasped the fundamental truth that production is far more essential than trade. I do not in the least underrate the importance of trade, but as a source of wealth and national wellbeing it is secondary to production, and if we give it the first place in our consideration we begin with a serious error and one capable of leading us far astray.

The true and lasting source of wealth is production, and trade, even though it enhances the value of the product, is at the same time a tax upon production, on account of the cost of transportation. A nation without trade may be permanently rich and prosperous, but a nation without production and dependent solely on trade holds riches and prosperity by a frail tenure. This proposition is susceptible of historic proof. The Venetians were at one time the richest people in Europe. They "held the gorgeous East in fee," and all the trade between the east and west passed through the city of the lagoons. Their wealth came from the cost of transportation which was paid to them and from the tolls and taxes which they imposed upon the vast quantities of merchandise which passed through their hands. They were sufficiently powerful to combat for years the power of the Turkish Empire, and they fought with Europe banded against them in the League of Cambray. They were not producers. They had no agriculture, and, except for the manufacture of glass, lace, and certain stuffs, they had no industries. The route to the East by the Cape of Good Hope was discovered and the eastern trade passed into new channels. With the departure of her trade, Venice sank to rise no more. She had no industries, no production to fall back upon. She became a second-rate Italian city, with nothing left of the days of her glory but the manufacture of lace and glass, the pictures which her artists had painted, and the palaces and churches which her merchant princes had built.

The Eastern trade passed to Portugal, and passed away leaving the country with only her native products for support. Holland built up her trade, threw off the yoke of Spain, and for a century was one of the first powers of Europe and the rival of England in the narrow seas. Yet Holland, despite her splendid people, was not large enough in territory nor strong enough in numbers to hold out against larger countries and more numerous races. She ceased to dominate in trade, and when trade failed she sank to what she is to-day, one of the lesser powers of Europe. She was saved from the fate of Venice not by the trade that remained, but by the fact that although trade had been her principal source of wealth, she was also a producer and a colonizer of productive countries, and it is her industries and her agriculture—in one word, her production—which has maintained her even as she is at the present time.

These examples show that trade alone can not assure to a people lasting prosperity, and if we look at it carefully we can see that there is no reason why it should be otherwise. Take trade in its last expression and it is but the exchange of existing values or their representatives. Trade is very brisk at Monte Carlo, and large sums of money are made and lost there by the exchange of what represents real values. Yet the prosperity of Monte Carlo is not desirable. Trade is most active in the Paris Bourse, the London Stock Exchange, and on Wall street. In all those places that which represents real values passes rapidly from hand to hand, and vast fortunes are lost and won. In no place is barter, so beloved of the free trader, carried to such an ideal height, yet the stock exchanges of the world add nothing to the real wealth of the community. They are conveniences, but they create nothing. They deal in the symbols of wealth, but the wealth itself is made elsewhere—on the farm and in the factory, in the mine, and the workshop.

Trade is really valuable only as a means of giving wider circulation to products. In this capacity it is of very great importance, but in no other, and the cost of transportation is a tax which production pays for this wider circulation. It is of the utmost importance that a nation should pay this tax to itself and not to others. We suffer from the fact that we pay the cost of transportation of our imports and exports largely to other nations, and we shall continue to do so until we give to our foreign commerce the same protection which other nations give to theirs, and which we have extended to our domestic industries and to our coastwise trade.

We have protected the shipbuilder but not the shipowner, and an incomplete system can not do otherwise than fail. We have refused protection to our commerce the precise point where England has bestowed it with lavish hand. Now we are asked to give up the system under which our industries and coastwise trade have flourished, and replace it by that under which our foreign carrying trade has been ruined.

The wider circulation of products then is, as I have said, the only thing in trade which enhances their value, and free trade promises us this by saying that if we adopt it we shall obtain the markets of the world. This is highly desirable, but we ought to know first just what we are going to get, and, second, what price we are going to pay, for it is quite possible to pay too high a price for anything, even the markets of the world, and we can get nothing under present earthly conditions without paying for it. When a free trader is asked what our immediate advantage is to be from the adoption of his policy, he glibly replies, "The markets of the world," and feels, after the manner of his school, that the whole matter is settled by a well-sounding phrase. Unfortunately we can not stop there. We must go farther and have something more satisfying than a glittering generality, the favorite hiding place of delusions. The "markets of the world" sounds delightfully, but what markets? At this point the free trader gives out, and yet it is the very essence of the whole question.

Let us run over briefly these markets of the world and see just what they are. To Europe we now sell cotton and wheat and a few great staples. England takes what she must and no more, and the same is true of the continent. No change of tariff policy would enlarge our European market for breadstuffs or food products. Our great and familiar exports, or staples, are in reality declining seriously owing to the competition of India, Egypt, and the Slavonic countries in the markets of Europe, which in the past we have practically controlled. This situation can not be affected by free trade or protection, because the markets from which we are being driven are not our own. Barter does not enter into it, for we do not take breadstuffs from anyone. We are simply being pushed out of foreign markets for breadstuffs by the competition of a labor so cheap that we can not meet it. In this connection I desire to give some statistics from a business journal of the highest statistical authority, the Boston Commercial Bulletin:

OUR FUTURE EXPORTS.

There is one feature in American industry that has failed to excite the attention it deserves.

We are exporting less of the old familiar American staples. The total exports for 1893 show that in many of them there is a marked decline, not only from last year's exportation but from the average exportation of the five years preceding, as follows:

Exports of calendar year 1893.

Articles, etc.	Decrease in value—
	From average of last five years.	From 1892.
Cattle	$4,163,826	$12,411,472
Corn	3,711,212	14,481,312
Copper ore	2,235,661	2,222,630
Cotton	43,923,855	12,957,535
Fish	1,706,642	1,408,737
Fruits	1,696,016	2,279,418
Mineral oils:
Crude	1,670,572	729,508
Manufactured	4,972,834	128,206
Dairy products	2,347,107	1,695,551

Our friends the enemy have assumed that the United States will always continue to be the producer and shipper of certain crude products, but with the exception of wheat, where we are still holding our own as yet, such is not the case.

Within the last twenty years other hitherto undeveloped countries have been making their presence felt in the most unpleasant fashion.

A typical instance is found in our exports of corn and wheat to Germany. In 1892 Germany bought from us 14,576,216 bushels of corn, in 1893 she bought but 7,652,932 bushels. In 1892 she purchased from us 5,730,822 bushels of wheat, in 1893 only 2,341,302.

Now, in 1893 Germany increased her purchases over those of 1892 of corn enormously from Bulgaria, Roumania, and Servia, and though she purchased a smaller total of wheat she increased her purchases from Roumania and the Argentine Republic.

The Argentine Republic is competing with us in wheat and meat. In the first six months of 1893, her exports of wheat to England alone were valued at $6,500,000.

There are 25,000,000 cattle in the Argentine Republic, and twenty-six establishments that find to-day an abundant business in shipping live cattle, exclusive of those occupied in shipping jerked and frozen beef.

British India is competing with us in cotton and cereals. In five years the imports of wheat from India into England increased in value by $12,000,000, though this year there has been a falling off.

Egypt is competing with us as a raiser of cotton, not only in European markets but in our own. The Egyptian cotton is flesh colored and silky. We imported cotton to the value of $3,715,421 in 1893, against $190,297 five years ago.

Russia is a strong competitor not only in breadstuffs, but in petroleum. As our exports of corn to Europe have declined the exports of cheap wheat from Russia have increased. In 1887 the exports of mineral oils from Russia were but 6,120,000 cwt., in 1891 they had increased to 17,196,300 cwt.

Canada is our bitterest foe on dairy products and her exports of cheese to England, particularly, have increased as ours have diminished.

This is the condition that confronts us. We are competing in the raising of breadstuffs and cotton not only with the poor Sclavonic peasants, but with Hindoo ryots and the Egyptian fellaheen. We are in all our crude products competing with a human element of production that will live and be happy with far less than will content our people.

From this it is apparent that we can not even hold our foreign market for breadstuffs, much less enlarge it; and it is also true that, with the exception of pork and other meat products, there is practically no market in Europe or in England, so far as we are concerned, for anything else. They are all industrial or manufacturing countries with large surplus production, and all except Great Britain have protective tariffs. Australia is protected, and so is Canada. There remain, then, the countries of the East and of South America, valuable markets, I have no doubt, but of limited purchasing power, and, as Mr. REED said in the House, "with three generations of Englishmen, Frenchmen, and Germans camped in possession of every avenue of trade." The markets of the world, therefore, come down to this, that under free trade we are to have an opportunity, according to the free-trader, a better opportunity than at present of struggling with England, France, and Germany for entrance into the Eastern and South American markets; that is, of competing for certain limited foreign markets against nations whose labor costs and standards of living are lower than our own. This does not seem a very magnificent opportunity, even as I have stated it, and yet I have made no reference to the price which free trade proposes to make us pay for this privilege, although the price must be considered before the case is complete.

Under Republican rule we entered upon a policy intended to give us a share of the South American market. We proposed by reciprocity to get the South American countries and West India Islands to admit us to their markets on better terms than other nations by offering them in return the free admission to our markets of certain of their products which we were bound to import in any event from some country, because we did not produce them ourselves. In other words, we paid them for admission to their markets with a preference over our competitors by favorable admission to our own. The policy was sound in theory and has begun to produce good results. The article in the Commercial Bulletin, from which I have just quoted, shows also that the decrease in our exports of breadstuffs is being replaced by an increase in the exports of manufactured articles of a higher value than the great staples, and that this is largely due to reciprocity.

The Bulletin says:

It is cheering to know that against this decline in one direction there has been an increase in another. There are certain products of the United States that have been steadily increasing their hold on foreign markets. The exports of 1893 exhibit them as follows:

Articles, etc.	Increases—
	Over average of preceding five years.	Over 1892.
Agricultural implements	$1,632,912	$980,539
Books	538,257	614,573
Carriages and cars	117,554	1,033,081
Coal	4,650,432	3,528,616
Copper goods	10,389,949	10,902,402
Cotton goods	1,181,596	292,287
Hops	1,787,648	1,719,568
Scientific apparatus, etc	321,891	403,147
Iron and steel wares	4,373,389	2,256,288
Leather manufactures	1,721,123	2,100,833
Paper manufactures	416,615	229,382
Paraffin	1,402,431	793,005
Seeds	3,464,513	2,806,044
Spirits	2,690,107	2,182,646
Tobacco	3,039,091	2,075,495

The increased use of electricity of course accounts for our increased exports of copper ingots, and Canada West is the purchaser that has been absorbing so large an increase of Yankee coal.

Generally speaking, it will be seen that thirty years of protection have transformed us from a country exporting little but the natural products of the soil into a country of vast and varied industries. The home market is, of course, much the more valuable, for, as the Boston Journal so admirably summarized the situation the other day, the United States consumes 30 per cent of all the sugar, 25 per cent of all the cotton, 30 per cent of all the coffee and copper, 33 per cent of all the steel and iron and wool and rubber, 40 per cent of all the coal, and 50 per cent of all the tin produced.

The future of the foreign trade of the United States lies not in shipping cotton to England, but flour to Cuba and cloth to Brazil.

It is an interesting fact that though the number of yards of cotton cloth exported from the United States dropped to 150,417,927 in 1893 from 171,754,048 in 1892, the value of our exports increased from 10,209,220 in 1892 to 10,347,821 in 1893. China's purchases of plain brown cottons fell off one-half, but the West Indies, Brazil, and Central America increased their purchases of colored and high-cost cottons to such an extent that the value of the total exported increased. The quantity of Brazil's purchases increased one-third, the value increased one-half.

The increase in our exports of manufactures of iron and steel is notably large; two-thirds of this represents engines and machinery. Cuba is our largest customer for machinery; Mexico and Brazil are liberal purchasers, as indeed is Great Britain, but whereas, except in hardware, England shows a decreasing disposition to buy, our Latin American neighbors have been increasing their purchases.

Is it not profitable to keep customers and enlarge the group of customers who buy our most expensive products and put a duty on those of European manufacture? The present House of Representatives does not think so. It has voted to abandon these new foreign markets for our manufactured products and to let down the bars of our own markets to the foreign producer.

The future historian of the United States will wonder at the folly of a nation thus ready to surrender not only its possessions but its prospects.

THE CASH VALUE OF RECIPROCITY.

In the last two editions of the Bulletin we have shown statistically how the European markets for our staples are slipping away from us. The very valuable annual report of the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics makes it possible to show also how American exports have blossomed in the new Latin American countries under the influence of reciprocity treaties.

The year 1892 is given for comparison because that year is the latest available for the French and English statistics. The German statistics are not at hand for a later year than 1891:

United States exports.

To—	1890.	1892.	1893.
Guatemala	$1,326,388	$1,809,577	$1,713,142
Honduras	522,631	478,947	442,907
Nicaragua	1,270,073	1,187,189	812,654
Salvador	886,231	1,274,021	1,118,054
British West Indies	8,074,433	7,995,185	7,912,341
San Domingo	926,651	984,188	1,106 733
Cuba	12,069,500	17,622,411	23,004,094
Puerto Rico	2,247,700	2,806,631	2,802,788
Brazil	11,902,496	14,240,009	12,339,584
British Guiana	2,011,122	1,885,542	1,953,012

The two countries of prime importance are Cuba and Brazil. In Cuba the heavy increase is due to an enormous relative increase in our exports of machinery, boots and shoes, corn, wheat flour, hog products, and lumber.

In Brazil the articles that have jumped furthest are railroad cars, machinery and hardware, bacon and pork, boards and furniture. More recently there has been a growth in the value of cotton cloths.

The reciprocity destroyer carefully covers up these figures and exults over the fact brought out by the above tables, that our exports to certain smaller countries with whom we have reciprocity treaties have apparently declined. Among these are Honduras, British Guiana, Nicaragua, and the British West Indies.

In the case of the British West Indies the imports of Bermuda from the United States are included in the Department's figures for 1890 and excluded in 1892. As the annual imports of Bermuda are $1,500,000, the bulk being food supplies from the United States and Canada, the apparent small decrease in the years selected is more than accounted for.

As to the genuine decreases, let us see how other countries have fared in Latin America. Great Britain's exports to Central America were £287,168 in 1890, and but £829,152 in 1891. France's exports to Central America were 1,836,329 francs in 1890 and 1,127,911 francs in 1892.

Both these countries show a net loss for all Central America. Taking all Central America together, the United States shows a very handsome relative net gain.

Great Britain exported to the British West Indies goods to the value of £2,624,472 in 1890, and but £2,184,349 in 1892. We are really gaining upon England in her own colonies.

Haiti and San Domingo are unfortunately classed together, one being out of and the other in our reciprocity arrangement. England's exports to the two fell during the two years in question from £528,357 to £247,971, France's from 13,474,176 francs to 9,201,461 francs. Our substantial gain in San Domingo almost offsets the loss in Haiti. Our exports to the two have fallen but from $6,028,115 to $5,947,618, a trifling decline when compared with England's. (When three years are considered American exports show a gain.)

England sold to the Spanish West Indies goods to the value of £1,876,756 in 1890, and but £1,478,171 in 1892. France's exports fell from 11,671,054 to 4,792,378 francs in the same year. As noted above, our exports in the two years increased 40 per cent, and in three years nearly 100 per cent.

England did increase her exports to Brazil from £7,458,628 to £7,910,326 (mostly in jute goods and telegraph wire). France, however, fell from 81,010,705 francs in 1890 to 69,520,091 francs in 1892. The United States gained more rapidly than England.

More than this, President Harrison proclaimed a specially hostile tariff against Colombia, Venezuela, and Haiti. It has been represented that the injury thus supposed to be done our exports has more than counterbalanced the gain secured in the other countries.

Now, our exports to Colombia have risen from $2,522,351 in 1890 to $3,047,620 in 1893; our exports to Venezuela rose from $3,984,280 in 1890 to $4,142,051 in 1893. Our exports to Haiti, as noted above, did decline a little in 1892, but from 1890 to 1893 they rose from $5,101,464 to $5,170,634.

As compared with 1890 we have in 1893 increased our exports to six out of the ten Latin American countries under reciprocity treaties and lost in four. The political uncertainty in Brazil in 1893 and the removal of Bermuda from the general classification of the West Indies make the apparent less than the actual gain.

However, as it stands, we have gained net in our exports to these countries $12,527,520 since 1890. We have lost but $577,897, and the countries that are buying less of us have become even more niggardly customers of European countries.

These new Latin American markets have in part at least offset the dwindling European demand for our old-time staples. The great Sclavonic countries with India and Egypt may break down the European demand for our petroleum, our wheat, and our cotton. Here, however, are markets they can not control.

Will President Cleveland civilly hand them also to Great Britain?

The free trader on seeing such figures as these is always prompt to exclaim that a manufacturer who can export ought not to have any protection. They forget that such manufacturers have reached this exporting point because the home market was secure. If you throw down the barriers which protect them at home you force them to struggle for the home market as for the foreign market, weakening their hold on the former and thereby losing the latter. More important still than the general proposition is the fact, which by itself is conclusive, that this increase of the export of manufactures is chiefly to countries with which we have lately formed reciprocity treaties, impossible without a protective tariff, for without protection you will have nothing to give for the advantages you ask and receive.

As reciprocity of this sort can not exist without protection, the Democratic party proposes to destroy it, as they do not seem to care for any extension of trade where the foreign country is obliged to make concessions to us. Under their scheme nothing is to be exacted from the foreigners, but we are to give everything. The price which we are to pay is not a limited admission to our market, but our market itself. They promise us an opportunity to compete, not for the markets of the world, but for a limited number of foreign markets, with nations having lower labor costs than ours. In return they ask us to abandon reciprocity, which is increasing our exports of manufactured products, and to throw our own market open to those same nations as well as to all others. The price is certain and enormous, while the vague promise, even if fulfilled, is as nothing to it; and when we add to all this the fact just shown, that our exports have increased faster than those of England, it seems incredible that anyone can be found to even attempt to argue that we shall enlarge our market by free trade. We not only sacrifice our home market, but sacrifice it for a system which increases exports less than protection.

And what a vast sacrifice the home market would be. Our own market is the best in the world, because we are the richest people with the largest purchasing power. If the statistics of Mulhall are correct, our 70,000,000 people equal in consumption 700,000,000, or half the population of the world outside our boundaries. This great home market is now our own. The free trader proposes to abandon it and throw it open to other nations from whom he asks nothing in return, and merely promises that we shall have a chance to compete on equal terms for the markets which we are already getting under reciprocity in the West Indies and in South America. As a business proposition no madder scheme was ever proposed and no more insane policy was ever urged upon an intelligent people. We are gravely asked to give up the American market, the most valuable material possession on the face of the earth, and we are not even offered a definite price. We are promised nothing but the vague result of a doubtful theory, and if English experience may be trusted a consequent diminution of exports.

This is literally all that free trade offers to the people of the United States in the direction of a wider circulation for our products. They have, however, on the domestic side another promise. They tell us that if we throw our market open to the world we shall be able to buy cheaper, or in other words that our purchasing power will be increased. This assumes that rates of wages will remain unchanged, for you can not enlarge a purchasing power by cheapening the thing purchased if you diminish the original purchasing power from other causes in an equal or greater ratio.

To put it a little more plainly, if a man earns $2 a day, and by cheapening what he buys you enable him to get for a dollar what now costs him a dollar and a half, you have increased his purchasing power; but if while you cheapen the article purchased you lower his wages from $2 to $1 a day, the net result is a diminution of his purchasing power and consequent privation. It is too often forgotten that two things go to make up purchasing power. One is the amount earned; the other is the cost of the thing purchased. The first is the more important and is generally neglected by the free traders. Yet purchasing power really rests on the power to earn—that is, upon production. If we do not produce we do not earn, and if we do not earn it is of very little consequence whether the things we desire to purchase are cheap or dear.

The proposition of the free trader that by the removal of duties we shall be enabled to buy cheaper, involves of necessity increased importations and a corresponding decrease either in the amount or the prices of the home product. If we increase importations, just so far do we replace American products with those of foreigners and just so far we proportionately narrow the opportunities for American labor. Here of course the free trader is ready with an answer. "You forget," he says, "the great principle of barter. If we buy foreign goods, where we formerly bought American goods, we pay for them with other products, and so, of course, the sum of production remains the same." Having thus completed his phrase, he stops just as he does with "the markets of the world." But we can not stop there. We must look farther. What are the American products with which we shall pay for these increased importations from Europe? Obviously not the great staples, for we now sell all that Europe can take. Obviously, again, not manufactured goods, for Europe has a large surplus production of those already. Nothing practically remains, then, but money; that is, our coin reserves and the product of our mines, to pay for these increased importations. In other words, we should enter upon a process of stripping ourselves of our gold and silver in order to pay for these increased importations which have replaced American goods.

But let us go still further into this matter. By replacing American products with foreign products we throw the labor normally employed in making those American products out of employment. That labor must go somewhere. The free trader says that it will find its way into those employments where we have a natural superiority and where it is most profitable. As usual, he stops short on a half truth, for this is not all. This labor, by going into fields already occupied, increases the supply of labor in those fields and reduces wages. The more you concentrate labor in a few fields of employment and the more you narrow its opportunities and diminish the diversification of industry the smaller will be the demand for labor and the greater will be the reduction of wages.

But there is still another side to this. Instead of narrowing the opportunities of labor we can prevent increased importations by making them unprofitable. But unfortunately the only way we can make them unprofitable is by making our own costs lower than those of the foreigners and there is no way to lower costs, except by lowering wages. Thus we come back at every turn of the free-trade policy to a reduction of wages, and every free trader who knows anything of his subject and is not talking for political effect, will admit this to be true.

Sometimes he forgets himself, and in a moment of frankness not only admits that free trade will reduce wages but defends the reduction. Such was the case with the Hon. JOHN C. BLACK, of Illinois, on the 9th of January last, during the tariff debate in the House. I quote from the RECORD:

"Mr. CANNON of Illinois. My colleague refers to a half million of immigrants coming to this country each year, the most of whom are attracted by the larger wages here. Do I understand my friend, that the remedy which he would propose to prevent that immigration would be by decreasing the wages of the American workingman by bringing him into competition, not with the half million who come to our borders annually from abroad, but with the labor of the two hundred millions on the other side, who would send their products here free, in competition with our labor?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. Well, the question is ponderous, but fair, and I will try to reply to it. If I was being chased by bees, I would throw the honey down. If I was being set upon by wolves, I would get the fresh meat out of their sight.

Mr. REED. Even if the children also did not get it?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. If I was certain that the American workingman of to-day was being overwhelmed by a vast mass of men seeking these shores because they believed that wages were higher—a belief which is false in the long run—and if I believed that that delusion depended upon a system of misleading laws, I should seek to repeal those laws, to let wages have their natural place all around the world, and let people move all around the world in their own way. I would not toil them over here by a system of laws, the effect of which is to drive American workingmen from their places, and to delude into starvation those who are thus attracted here.

Mr. REED. Then the gentleman favors an equality of wages between this country and others from which we have immigration?

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. That is not a fair way to put the question.

Mr. REED. You can make it fair in answering.

Mr. BLACK of Illinois. I make answer by the removal of the artificial means by which we create a fictitious value of the article of wages, and let wages have its natural level, as it does elsewhere.

Here is a complete confession which no subsequent explanation could disguise, and the simile used to defend it is quite perfect. We have honey and are to throw it down because the bees pursue us. We have meat and are to get rid of wolves by throwing it away. Why not keep the honey and drive off the bees? Why not keep the meat and shoot the wolves? Yet this typical free trader asks us to give up a good thing because other people want it and advises our lowering wages because other people come here in search of them. No more complete picture of what free trade means and to what it leads could possibly be devised.

Sometimes the free trader will say more adroitly but less truthfully that the reduction of wages will be met by the cheapening of articles to be purchased, but statistics show that this is false. In the comparisons made by Col. Wright between the Massachusetts industries and those of England, it was proved that after every allowance made for greater cheapness of commodities and of the necessaries of life, the Massachusetts workingman had a net advantage of between 45 and 50 per cent over his British competitor. Therefore, under free trade we must have an actual net reduction in our wages, whether we force our labor into other channels of employment or whether we compete with foreign industries. This means a lowering of the standard of living, which will be little short of a revolution. We pay for everything in this world, and this reduction of wages and diminution of earning power is the heavy price we must pay for the greater cheapness promised by the free trader.

There is in this connection another most important point to be considered. Whether under free trade goods would be cheaper and the purchasing power of a dollar increased, it is certain that the price of labor would be greatly reduced. Now, the labor cost is the chief and indeed nearly the whole cost in everything we have. All our railroads and factories have been built, our farms cleared, our mines developed at a certain labor cost. Reduce suddenly the value of labor by free trade and the whole of our vast industrial and transportation plant will be reduced in value. It must come down to the level of the new and lower labor costs at which future competitors could be constructed. This would mean a revolution in the value of all the machinery of industry and transportation and would involve a vast liquidation and gigantic losses, coming as this change would come with such a sudden shock. The loss to business and capital of such a rapid change would be incalculable, and the further loss to labor which this destruction to capital would cause would be more incalculable still.

The wealth of a country is in production and the strength of a country is in its producers. It is worse than idle to talk about consumers as if they were a vast proportion and distinct part of the population, who ought alone to be considered. The mere consumers constitute not only an insignificant but wholly unimportant fraction of the community. Everybody is a consumer and at the same time a producer, or dependent upon production for his support. The first object of our policy, therefore, should be to do what is best for the producer, because production means both wealth and wages, and consumption depends upon the capacity for production. If, in a search for other markets, we give up our own, we lose more than we gain, and instead of widening we narrow the circulation of our products and thereby diminish their value and limit production.

Our first object should be to hold our own market, because it is the largest and best; and that being done and our own market securely guarded, our next object should be to increase our outside markets by any possible device. By means of invention and protection we have been enabled thus far to maintain high rates of wages in the United States, while lowering the price of the necessaries and comforts of life and raising the standard of living. If we abandon protection we shall probably in many directions increase prices by withdrawing American competition from the competition of the world and thereby raising the world's price. In any event we shall lower wages. Protection does not make high wages, but it helps to prevent their reduction. We have high wages in the United States, and our labor costs are consequently high. So far as natural resources go, we are more richly endowed by nature than any country in the world. It is only when we take from the earth its manifold gifts and touch them with the hands of labor that they become higher priced than elsewhere.

The entire difference between our prices and those of Europe, when such difference exists, really lies in the labor costs. From the man who digs the clay, quarries the stone, or mines the iron from which the factory is built, to the operative who guides the most complicated machinery in the completed buildings, the labor cost is greater than in Europe, and the labor cost practically constitutes the whole cost, so far as any question of competition is concerned. With a duty equal to the difference in labor costs, our rates of wages can be maintained against outside competition. With the removal of such duties we must bring our labor costs down to theirs or we must cease to manufacture and compete. To maintain these rates of wages is the whole purpose of protection after we have got beyond the stage of establishing our industrial independence.

To maintain high rates of wages and to give, if possible, the fullest scope for their increase, I believe to be essential, because I believe good wages absolutely vital to the stability of our institutions and of our society. Protection and free trade present a social far more than an economic question, for on high wages and high standards of living depends the stability of society, and especially in a republic where every man has a vote, and where no privileged classes exist. Protection in its widest aspect is something far more than a mere question of schedules or of national bookkeeping. It is an effort to defend by legislation our standards of living, just as the exclusion of the Chinese and of contract labor was. Protection is one feature of a great policy of self-preservation, which I believe to be essential to the future of this Republic. To abandon it is to enter on changes which will go to the very bottom of our social and political fabric.

Look at this country since the threat of free trade has hung closely over it. Look at the miseries and losses and wage reductions of the past year. If this is the result of the menace, what will the reality be? The reductions of wages thus far made are trifling to what will come if this bill becomes law and men seek to adjust themselves to the new conditions. Such a lowering of wages is not to be contemplated without the deepest alarm. The country is agitated and frightened as at no previous time. "There is darkness before and danger's voice behind." While we debate rates of duties, the threat of this bill is really breaking down an important part of a broad general policy of society and government on which we must rely unless we are prepared to meet the shock of changes, which it would be difficult to portray. I have no fear of the ultimate result. I believe that the mighty forces which have brought the great races of man to their present position will not cease to operate. I feel sure that in the end we shall not cast aside the policies which are to protect us from the lowering and deadly competition of races with lower standards of living than our own.

But however confident I may feel of the ultimate result, I do not wish to see my country go through the wretchedness which even a temporary abandonment of these policies will cause. It is too great a risk to take, too high a price to pay. Any great industrial change, no matter how fair its promises, is a grave peril and sure to entail grievous losses. Let me quote on this point one of the first of American political economists, Gen. Francis A. Walker, who is not a protectionist. In a recent pamphlet on the subject of bimetallism, Gen. Walker says:

> These are the economists who say that what one loses another will gain. They are the same economists who used to assert that it would not matter if wages were at any time unduly depressed by combinations of employers, inasmuch as the excess of profits resulting would infallibly become capital, and as such constitute an additional demand for labor; and so the wrong would tend to right itself.
> It has been the teaching of the economists of this sort which has so deeply discredited political economy with the laboring men on the one hand, and with practical business men on the other. The political economy of to-day recognizes the industrial structure as of the highest importance; it teaches that industrial injuries remain, deepen, and tend to become permanent; that sudden and violent changes are always to the prejudice of the least fortunate members of society—the poor, the ignorant, and the inert, those who have little capital, those who are distant from the market, those who are at a disadvantage in the economic struggle, from whatever cause. It is with industrial society as it is with the human body. A certain portion of its substance is always in a fluid state, circulating unceasingly through the system, nourishing as it goes every part, every organ, every limb; but by far the largest part has taken on a permanent and unchangeable form which can not be crushed or mutilated or punctured without serious, perhaps fatal, injury.
> The political economy which treats industrial society as in a state of flux, which regards undeserved losses as amply compensated by unearned gains of an equal amount, which declares that, whatever happens in the field of industry, readjustment will promptly and surely take place, is exactly on a par with the physiology which should assume that a tall, lank man could, by the pressure of a certain number of "atmospheres," be made over at will into a short, stout man of the same weight, without loss of life or energy.

The Democratic party has undertaken to make a revolutionary change in our industrial system, and the effects pointed out by Gen. WALKER have followed hard upon the threat. Yet the Democrats have lost heart as they have proceeded. One concession has followed another until it would be a mockery to call this bill the expression of any economic doctrine, still more so to represent it as carrying out the principles declared by the Democratic party at Chicago. A broad and equal policy of free trade might be defended on theoretical grounds. It would at least have meaning and could be understood. But a bill which wrecks a protective policy only to put in its place a set of schedules which slaughters some industries and gives premiums to others is wholly indefensible. To replace a protective system with free trade is at least intelligible, but to destroy by threats of industrial revolution such a prosperity as we enjoyed under the protective system in 1892 is as wanton as it is ignorant and cruel. If we are to have protection let us have it for every interest, equal and fair to all. If we are to have free trade let us have the real thing and have it for everybody, for that at least will be fair. But an ignorant mixture of these two systems is in practice as impossible as it is unjust.

I reserve what I have to say on the details of this measure for some future occasion. I do not propose to spend any time now in discussing the bill before us. As I have said, it embodies no policy and has no system. It is not protection; it is not free trade. It is a mere collection of preferences and revenges. It is filled with injustice and inequality. It shuts the door upon any hope of union with Canada, for it gives to Canada every advantage of union without exacting any return, and frees her from all inducements to become, as she ought to become, part of the United States. It is a reactionary movement to an outworn system resting on a general doctrine which finds no defense in practice anywhere. It has no element of stability, and its enactment promises nothing but continued change and agitation. The stock jobbing and speculation of Wall street have been with it from its cradle, and soon, I trust, may weep beside its grave. The great trusts are guarded by its provisions, but there is no line to show that the farmer, the workingman, or the manufacturer have been heard or regarded in its schedules.

I turn from this printed deformity to the broad principle which the party to whom we owe this bill pretended to advocate and which I have already discussed. That is the principle of let alone in the Government, the refusal to use the power of the state to benefit the community. Protection rests on the broad doctrine that the power of the community can be wisely used in certain cases for the benefit of the whole body politic. There is no magic in it. We leave to the free trader the privilege of claiming that he has a panacea for all human ills in a patent tariff policy.

We uphold a system of tariff protection because we believe it is one important method of defending the standards of living in the United States from a fatal and degrading competition. We believe in maintaining, defending, and uplifting the standards of living of the American people, because upon those standards rest our civilization and the onward march of our race. Men have struggled up from the darkness which shrouds their beginnings by slow and strenuous endeavor. They have fought their way to the light through many defeats and with much sore labor. They have not done it by any doctrine of "laissez faire" or "let-alone," but by united and unresting effort. The same force which has created great nations has created civilization, and great nations are the denial of the let-alone theory. "Laissez faire, Supply-and-Demand, one begins to be weary of all that. Leave all to egoism, to ravenous greed of money, of pleasure, of applause. It is the Gospel of Despair." [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, after the attractive and fascinating way in which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has presented his subject, I do not think any other Senator will desire to address the Senate to-night. I purpose to follow; but, as my speech will be very plain, I should like to get as near twenty-four hours away from the effect of the eloquent speech of the Senator from Massachusetts as is possible; and I therefore suggest that an executive session be now held.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator will withdraw his suggestion, I should like to make a speech of about three seconds.

Mr. HALE. Whenever the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has in mind a speech of three seconds or three minutes or more we are always glad to hear him, and therefore I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HOAR. I ask to have my speech read from the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[The Associated Press bulletin.]

NEW YORK, April 10, 1894.

The New York Legislature, by a vote of 102 to 3, on motion of Ainsworth, Republican, adopted a resolution thanking Senator HILL for his opposition to the Wilson bill.

[Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to remind the occupants of the galleries that expressions of approval or disapproval are not permitted under the rules.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. GRAY. I merely desire to state, what was not read from the desk, that the house of assembly of the State of New York, which passed that resolution, is overwhelmingly Republican.

Mr. HALE. But not by any such majority as that by which the resolution passed.

Mr. HOAR. Nearly half are Democrats.

Mr. GRAY. The body is overwhelmingly Republican.

Mr. ALDRICH. To be historically accurate in regard to the political complexion of the New York assembly, I understand that there are 14 Republican majority in that body, and that the resolution which it passed must have received about 40 Democratic votes.

Mr. HOAR. And there were but 3 votes against it.

Mr. GRAY. It is an overwhelmingly Republican house. The Republican side of this Senate approves of it also.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6556) to provide for further urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1894, and for other purposes, have instructed me to report it favorably with sundry amendments.

Mr. MANDERSON. I desire to make a suggestion in connection with the appropriation bills. We are nearing the time when there will be action in both Houses in reference to such bills, and I suggest that we should add to the Calendar, as is usual about this time of the session, a list of the appropriation bills, showing their status. It would be a very great convenience to the Senate, and I hope it may be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Senator simply desires to have a statement on the Calendar showing the status of the bills?

Mr. MANDERSON. Exactly.

Mr. COCKRELL. That can be readily done. The fortifications and pension appropriation bills are already upon the Senate Calendar.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations when it is the intention of the committee to take up the fortifications appropriation bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. Just as soon as an opportunity can be obtained.

Mr. CHANDLER. Whether this week or next week?

Mr. COCKRELL. I can not tell.

Mr. CHANDLER. Will the Senator kindly give a day or two's notice before calling the bill up?

Mr. COCKRELL. I shall give notice as long in advance as I can.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask action on the suggestion made by me. I suppose there will be no objection to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered.

Mr. COCKRELL. As the bill I have reported is an urgent deficiency bill, and provides the machinery for the United States courts, jurors, and witness fees throughout the United States, I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CHANDLER. Unless the bill is printed with the amendments, I shall certainly object. The Senator can call the bill up to morrow morning or we can come here to-night to consider it if the Senator desires.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri, and the bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HALE. I have not yielded the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest, with the consent of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], that the tariff bill go over until to-morrow at 1 o'clock, the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] being entitled to the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. It is now twenty minutes to 5 o'clock, and as various Senators desire an executive session this evening, I shall accede to the request of the Senator from Rhode Island, so far as I am concerned, and move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened and (at 6 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 11, 1894, at 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 10, 1894.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. B. BAGBY.

The Journal was read and approved.

BRIDGE ACROSS SULPHUR RIVER, ARKANSAS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 1917) authorizing the Texarkana and Fort Smith Railway Company to bridge the Sulphur River, in the State of Arkansas or in the State of Texas, with Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. REED. Is not the first thing in order the Sergeant-at-Arms' report?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, but the Chair will hear the gentleman on the question.

Mr. REED. It seems as if that would come up directly after the reading of the Journal, because the House was dividing on the subject.

The SPEAKER. The previous question had not been ordered upon it.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; the previous question was not ordered. But this is a privileged report, a report of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and came in before any other business; and it is privileged until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The report came in after the business on the Speaker's table had been disposed of.

Mr. REED. Even in that case it is privileged business until finished.

Mr. SPRINGER. Would it not then be in the nature of unfinished business? The matter had not been called up. The matter was suggested yesterday, and it went over without decision. It has not been called up this morning.

Mr. REED. It seems to me that will make no difference, because it is a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. So is a contested-election case a privileged question; but it does not come up from day to day without being called up.

Mr. REED. If the House is dividing on it, and it has not decided, is it not in order? The House was dividing when it adjourned on Saturday.

The SPEAKER. But that does not bring the matter up the next morning unless the previous question is ordered.

Mr. REED. It seems to me that it would. Would it not be like any other unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. Suppose it is not privileged, it would not come up the next morning without the previous question had been ordered.

Mr. REED. I do not know that it would; but being a report of the Sergeant-at-Arms, it must be disposed of before you proceed to other business, it seems to me.

The SPEAKER. Yes, when the Sergeant-at-Arms reports the matter.

Mr. REED. But the Sergeant-at-Arms' report is up for disposal by the House. The Sergeant-at-Arms' report represents certain members not arrested still subject to arrest; and the House ought to have an opportunity to dispose of the question and to determine whether it will vacate the order, because the spectacle is now presented to the House of a certain number of members ordered to be arrested. They are not yet arrested, and the Sergeant-at-Arms' duty is not concluded. I do not know how large a number of members are under threat of arrest by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and that can not be a condition of things which is seemly, in my judgment; but the House ought to take it up and dispose of it.

The SPEAKER. The only question now is whether it comes up without being called up.

Mr. REED. It seems to me as if it must.

The SPEAKER. Whether it comes up without being called up, the previous question not having been ordered?

Mr. REED. It is not a question of the previous question, the House having been dividing on the subject.

The SPEAKER. The fact that the House divides on a subject does not give it any standing whatever more than it would have if the House had not divided.

Mr. REED. No; but this is a question to which privilege is attached, and we stop right in the midst of a roll call.

The SPEAKER. Unless the privileged matter were called up it could not come up of itself unless the previous question was ordered, which has been held to bring matters up immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. REED. I think it has been held—though I am not prepared with an authority at present, the matter seemed to me so clear—that when the House is dividing on a question on a matter of privilege and adjourns on a division, that matter must come up and be disposed of. It can not be laid aside in this way.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that would only make it what is known as unfinished business.

Mr. REED. In that case it ought to come up at once.

The SPEAKER. Unfinished business, the gentleman will recollect, comes up at a later period under the rule. The Chair will cause the rule to be read.

Mr. SPRINGER. Paragraph 5 of Rule XXIV is that which relates to unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

5. After the hour under the preceding clause shall have been occupied, it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business in which the House may have been engaged at an adjournment, and at the same time each day thereafter, other than the first and third Mondays, until disposed of; and it shall be in order to proceed to the consideration of all other unfinished business whenever the class of business to which it belongs shall be in order.

The SPEAKER. Now, this business is unfinished business in which the House was engaged at the hour of adjournment, but unless there is something to bring it up other than the ordinary rule it would come up only after what is known as the second morning hour.

Mr. REED. But it was privileged business, and if the Chair decides that it must be brought up, I desire to have it brought up and disposed of. I think the question ought to be settled about these members who are now under liability of arrest.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Does the Chair decide that it should come up after the second morning hour?

The SPEAKER. No; the Chair did not make any decision. The Chair merely had the rule read. The Chair will hear gentlemen on the question. The inclination of the Chair would be to hold that this matter would not come up unless it was called up, although it might be a privileged matter. Even a contested-election case, which is a matter of the highest privilege, does not come up of its own motion.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. If this be a privileged matter at all, its privilege is not of such a character that the House must cease all other business and turn aside to consider it.

Mr. REED. I think it will be found that when the House is dividing we must continue the division.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. No; I do not think there is any authority for that. In all my experience here I do not recall a single occasion when such a proposition was held to be correct.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, this is a privileged question to the members who are affected by the order of arrest. It is a privileged matter as to the members whose names are embraced in the report of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and any of them can call it up; but it is not privileged as to me or as to the gentleman from Maine, because we are not affected by it.

Mr. REED. It is a matter which concerns the House of Representatives. May I inquire, Mr. Speaker, how many members were ordered to be arrested?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that there were 28.

Mr. REED. Then 28 members of the House are under liability to arrest, and if this kind of proceeding be correct—I am quite sure it is not, but if it be—then 28 members of this House have this arrest held over them by the mere whim of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and the doctrine which would leave that matter undisposed of can not possibly be sound. It is not a doctrine which gentlemen can afford to establish in view of the near future.

Mr. SPRINGER. Well, if the gentleman from Maine has no objection I will ask unanimous consent for the discharge of the order for the arrest of those members.

Mr. REED. You have a motion now pending for that very purpose, which motion is now before the House.

Mr. SPRINGER. But I say, if the gentleman does not object, we can have unanimous consent to have the order discharged.

Mr. REED. I should prefer the regular course. And if this is not a question of the highest privilege, I do not know what could be.

Mr. SPRINGER. Did anybody call this up? If not, I call for the regular order.

Mr. BURROWS. May I call the attention of the Chair to three paragraphs on page 486 of the Digest which I hold in my hand? I do not know whether the paging of the Speaker's copy agrees with this. These three paragraphs, which are found under the head of "Practice," throw some light, I think, on this question.

The SPEAKER. They do.

Mr. BURROWS. I refer to the language:

A privileged proposition pending at an adjournment does not necessarily recur as the regular order of business after the approval of the Journal on the following day until called up.

The SPEAKER. That was the idea of the Chair. This decision, in the first session of the Fifty-third Congress, as just read by the gentleman, is to the effect that—

A privileged proposition pending at an adjournment does not necessarily recur as the regular order of business after the approval of the Journal on the following day until called up by a member.

Mr. SPRINGER. If nobody calls this up, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The idea of the Chair was, that as the previous question was not ordered upon this matter, it did not come up unless called up.

Mr. SPRINGER. Nobody has called it up. I ask for the regular order.

Mr. REED. There is a decision of Mr. Speaker Carlisle to this effect:

A privileged proposition once considered remains privileged from day to day until disposed of, subject, of course, to questions of higher privilege.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly; if a matter be privileged, it does not lose its privilege because its consideration is not finished when first taken up.

Mr. REED. It must be plainly a question of privilege, or else it could not have come in.

The SPEAKER. No point was made in that respect at all. All that the Chair holds now is that this matter does not come up unless called up.

Mr. REED. Then I think I will call it up.

Mr. McRAE. The gentleman can not call it up pending the consideration of the matter already before the House.

Mr. REED. I interposed at once.

Mr. McRAE. Not until this matter had been submitted.

Mr. REED. Well, I do not care to make any question about this particular matter in which the gentleman from Arkansas is interested.

The SPEAKER. This is only a formal amendment to a bridge bill. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment and it will be disposed of.

The amendments of the Senate were read.

Mr. McRAE. I ask that these amendments be concurred in.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, these amendments, being merely formal, will be concurred in. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from Maine now calls up the question which was before the House on Saturday last at the time of the adjournment.

Mr. SPRINGER. I withdraw the motion to discharge the order.

Mr. REED. I make the point of order that the motion can not be withdrawn.

Mr. DOCKERY. There has been no vote.

Mr. SPRINGER. There has been no vote—no decision of the House upon it.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is this motion pending in any sense of the word? Did it come over to this time? Is it necessary that it should now be withdrawn?

The SPEAKER. If it is a privileged matter it can be called up.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. But is the motion pending? Is the report of the Sergeant-at-Arms a privileged matter in such a sense that it may be called up and another motion must be made for the disposal of it?

The SPEAKER. The motion was to discharge the order, and on that the yeas and nays were ordered. The gentleman from Maine makes the point that the gentleman from Illinois can not withdraw his motion.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. But I understand the gentleman from Maine calls up, not the motion which was made, but the report of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

The SPEAKER. Oh, no; the motion. The report is not before the House; that is not the question to be voted on; it is the motion.

Mr. REED. Now, it would not be contended for an instant that the gentleman from Illinois would have the right to interrupt a roll call for the purpose of withdrawing a motion which the House was commencing to decide. It will not be pretended that the rule goes to the extent that it can make any difference whatever in regard to the question that it goes over to another day. We are in the midst of a roll call. The House was on the point of expressing its opinion on the subject presented by the motion of the gentleman from Illinois; and I have never known an instance where it was permitted, under the practice of the House, to interrupt a roll call for the purpose of withdrawing the motion on which the question was being taken. In fact, the Chair has held, in regard to the interruption of a roll call the other day, with such severity the opinion that it could not be interrupted, that I can hardly see how the Chair could hold that such an interruption would be permissible at this stage of the proceedings.

The SPEAKER. But how does the gentleman from Maine regard this as interrupting a roll call? There is no roll call in progress.

Mr. REED. There is. We are in process of dividing upon a question.

This is the status of the affair: The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] made a motion to discharge the proceedings under a call of the House, and on that motion we were dividing, and the roll had been called once, no quorum having been discovered. Nothing was to be done under the circumstances except to adjourn, or to obtain the presence of a quorum. Whenever the subject is resumed, therefore, it is resumed exactly at the point where it was left off; that is to say, at the roll call.

We were dividing on that question; we were testing the sense of the House on it, and the fact that there was no quorum present does not give the right of withdrawal to the mover of the resolution any more than he would have the right to withdraw it in the middle of any other proceeding or division for obtaining the sense of the House. That seems to be clear.

Mr. SPRINGER. But we are not in the midst of a roll call now.

Mr. REED. We are, most assuredly.

Mr. SPRINGER. No quorum voted on the question when it was presented——

Mr. REED. When the question is again before the House the first thing in order for the Chair to do will be to direct the Clerk to call the roll.

The SPEAKER. A great many questions—or many questions—might arise between roll calls that could not be entertained pending them. That is simply a rule of practice, or a custom of the House. As a matter of the orderly transaction of business, the rule provides that a roll call shall not be interrupted. For instance, you could not interrupt a roll call to make a motion to adjourn, and yet between roll calls on the same subject the motion is permissible and may be made. So also with other motions which may intervene.

So there is a distinction between an actual roll call, when it is being called, and a case where the roll call has only been ordered to be taken.

Mr. REED. I beg to submit that nothing would be in order after the roll call has been commenced, except an effort which could be made for securing a quorum or an adjournment. And in any event the House is in the midst of a division on the subject. It is dividing on the question, and the only thing that can interrupt it properly, without general consent, or a mistake in calling it too quick, or something of that sort, would be proceedings under the rule to obtain a quorum; and the purpose of this proceeding is to make this very roll call effective. It concerns the roll call being taken and nothing else.

The proposition is simply this: The roll call is interrupted by the failure to secure the presence of a quorum. Thereupon the House proceeds at once to obtain it, or else the House adjourns in the expectation that there will be a quorum present on the next day.

When the question comes up we are still left with the yeas and nays ordered, and the Clerk should be directed to go on and call the roll. It seems to me that the only thing that the Chair can do is to continue the proceeding which the House had ordered, which is only partially completed. Anything else would lead to confusion and to the introduction of other resolutions, and to stop the House in the midst of a division.

Now, there is only one thing that I know of that can stop the House in the midst of a division, except by general consent or by the Speaker's having made an error which he rectifies. The only other thing that can stop it, it seems to me, is the lack of a quorum; and the quorum having been obtained, or an adjournment having taken place and a quorum being supposed to be present, why then the division must go on.

On the first division, not on yeas and nays, but on a rising vote or a vote by sound, if only one side has been called and somebody still desires to address the House, under parliamentary law he is entitled so to do; but that is because only one side has been called. In a yea-and-nay vote both sides are called at the same time, and hence there is no opportunity for discussion, and there can be no opportunity for a motion; and the withdrawal of a motion is itself in the nature of a motion.

Under ordinary parliamentary law, a motion once submitted to the House can not be withdrawn. It requires a motion to withdraw it. Under our rules it is stated that it may be withdrawn at any time before a decision by the House or amendment. The word "decision" of course must have some signification or other, either a full signification or a signification pro tanto. It seems to me that I have never known it to be given the full signification that a roll call could be interrupted on account of it.

Now, the roll call is not simply the voice of the Clerk calling the names. A roll call is commenced and discovered to be futile on account of the absence or supposed absence of a quorum; but when you resume again, you resume upon the supposition of a quorum. You have the yeas and nays ordered, and the roll call is virtually on—absolutely on. My colleague [Mr. DINGLEY] has a precedent, I understand.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to a precedent, a ruling by Speaker Carlisle in the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress, to be found on page 566 of the Manual, which may be considered in disposing of this matter:

Where the yeas and nays are ordered and taken on a pending proposition and no quorum appears, the order of the House for the yeas and nays remains in force until reconsidered; and should the House adjourn without disposing of such pending question, it would come up after the reading of the Journal on the following day.

That was held by Speaker Carlisle at the first session of the Forty-ninth Congress. That seems to have a bearing on the questions which have been raised.

Mr. REED. I was quite sure that was the ruling.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to Rule XVI, clause 2:

When a motion has been made, the Speaker shall state it, or (if it be in writing) cause it to be read aloud by the Clerk before being debated, and it shall then be in possession of the House, but may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or amendment.

That is the text of the rule. Now, on page 434 of the Digest it is said in a note—

Whether a motion may be withdrawn after an order for the yeas and nays thereon, which may be demanded by one-fifth of those present, seems to be an open question. As, according to the practice, this is but a method of taking a vote, it is not clear that it should be so construed as to deprive the mover of his control of the proposition.

It may be withdrawn while the House is dividing on a demand for the previous question.

There is a citation to the Journal of the second session of the Twenty-ninth Congress, page 241:

And all incidental questions fall with such withdrawal.

Citing the Journal of the first session of the Twenty-sixth Congress, page 57.

Here it is stated in the Digest that it has not heretofore been decided whether a motion can be withdrawn after the previous question has been ordered upon it, but the inference is clearly held out that it may be withdrawn, from the fact that it was decided on two occasions, as I have already stated, that a motion may be withdrawn while the House is dividing on a demand for the previous question, and all incidental questions fall with such withdrawal. Ordering the yeas and nays is a mere incidental question, and when the question upon which the yeas and nays were ordered has been withdrawn, that order for the yeas and nays falls, being an incidental question.

In this case there has been no decision and no amendment; and the rules provide in so many words that it may be withdrawn at any time before a decision or an amendment. What is a decision? It is a decision upon a motion; a decision by the House. The House must have passed some judgment upon the proposition. That is a decision; or it must have been amended.

Mr. REED. The gentleman is of long experience here. Can he recollect a single instance where a motion was withdrawn after the yeas and nays had been called? You see what that would lead to. That would lead, if this proposition be accepted, to the abuse that a member could try a measure here in the House, and when the House had virtually decided, he could learn from the Clerk's desk what the vote was, and if it was against him he could withdraw it after the House had virtually gone through the whole matter. That can not possibly be the meaning of the rule, it seems to me, unless some precedent can be found for it.

I must say that, while there is nothing so treacherous as the human memory as to events that occur in the House, I may say I recollect no instance where anything of that kind was ever attempted; and I challenge the gentleman from Illinois to know if he has any recollection of any such specific action whatever.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no recollection of any case that I can at present recall.

Mr. REED. I have no recollection of any such case, and I have been here for a long time.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have the citation contained in the Digest, which I will read again, that it has been regarded by the compiler as an open question whether a proposition may be withdrawn after the yeas and nays have been ordered. The practice has been that it has been withdrawn while the House was dividing on ordering the previous question, which is an incidental question. The Speaker has permitted it to be withdrawn before a decision was announced.

That was decided in the Twenty-ninth Congress, and in the decision in the Twenty-second Congress it is stated that all incidental questions fall with such withdrawal. Therefore he assumes that incidental questions do arise between the making of the motions, submitting the propositions, and the time when they are decided; and if such incidental questions are interjected into the proceedings, it does not prevent the withdrawal of the main proposition, which, according to this ruling, provides that these incidental questions shall fall with the withdrawal of the motion. Therefore, there can be nothing to fall or nothing that can fall unless there had been intervening and incidental questions; and the ordering of the yeas and nays is an incidental question.

A motion for the previous question is an incidental question, and they stand precisely upon the same footing. They are incidental; they are not the main question; not the question upon which the House is called upon to decide; but questions leading to it, and incidental to it; and if they may fall, if they do fall with the withdrawal of the main proposition, it is fair to assume that the main proposition can be withdrawn. So that, if it be in conformity with the rule that such incidental questions do fall when the main question is withdrawn—which is what I propose to do by withdrawing the main proposition; when that is withdrawn, the incidental questions—the demand for the order of the yeas and nays and the demand for the previous question—would fall with the withdrawal of the main question.

The SPEAKER. The question suggested is a very important one in the practice of the House. The Chair has before him——

Mr. REED. If the Chair desires any further opportunity to examine into the matter I have no objection to its going over to another day, none whatever.

The SPEAKER. It is a very important question.

Mr. REED. If the Chair would regard it as a desirable thing I will consent to it going over.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be very glad to have it go over. The Chair has before him the only two decisions that he has been able to find, and they are not very clear. It is a very important matter——

Mr. SPRINGER. I would like it to go over.

The SPEAKER. It is a very important matter as to the right of a member to withdraw his motion. Without prejudice to any right, then, the matter will stand over, as it did yesterday, until to-morrow.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE TENNESSEE RIVER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a bill (H. R. 5041) to extend the time authorizing the St. Louis and Birmingham Railroad to build a bridge across the Tennessee River at Clifton, Tenn.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendment be concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert: That the St. Louis and Birmingham Railway Company, being a corporation created and organized under the laws of the State of Tennessee, and to which authority was given by an act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize building a bridge over Tennessee River," approved June 6, 1892, is hereby given the right to begin the construction of the bridge therein authorized according to the terms of said act within twelve months from the approval of this act, the said bridge to be completed within three years from said date. It is hereby further provided that if the construction of said bridge be not commenced and the structure completed within the times hereinbefore mentioned, then this act, and that approved June 6, 1892, to which reference is hereinbefore made, shall be null and void.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved without any liability on the part of the United States for any damages on account of such alteration, amendment, or repeal.

The amendment was concurred in.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (S. 1112) to provide for a survey for a bridge across the Eastern Branch of the Potomac River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (S. 1757) to provide for the sale of the old custom-house building in the city of Erie, Pa.; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ALDERSON, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. SNODGRASS, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. IKIRT, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

To Mr. HAINES, until Friday, on account of important business.

JOHN I. PATMAN.

Mr. CABANISS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the House bill No. 5111, for the relief of John I. Patman. This bill has been considered by the House in Committee of the Whole, and an amendment or a substitute for the bill has been reported favorably.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the roll of Capt. William U. Anderson, Maj. James Woods's Battalion of Georgia Volunteers, in the Indian war of 1836, the name of John I. Patman as a private, and recognize his service in said organization from the 10th day of June, 1836, when mustered into service, to the — day of August, 1836, when mustered out and honorably discharged.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place upon the pension roll the name of John J. Patman, late a private in Capt. William U. Anderson's company, Maj. James Woods's Battalion Georgia Volunteers, in the Indian war of 1836, and allow him a pension rated at $8 per month.

Mr. STALLINGS. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this bill has been considered by the Committee of the Whole at a Friday night session?

Mr. CABANISS. Yes, sir, and reported favorably.

Mr. KILGORE. My understanding is that this is a case in which the applicant named in the bill does not appear on any muster roll.

Mr. CABANISS. That is the fact, as I understand.

Mr. KILGORE. The gentleman says that this bill was reported favorably by the House in Committee of the Whole. Was there any proof that this man had really served in the company?

Mr. CABANISS. There was the testimony of some of his comrades and also of his captain.

Mr. KILGORE. But the muster roll shows nothing.

Mr. CABANISS. No. The original roll, I understand, was lost.

Mr. KILGORE. And the theory is that in making the duplicate he was left out.

Mr. CABANISS. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. I did not quite catch the contents of the bill from the reading. I will ask the gentleman who calls it up whether the original bill was not to correct a military record?

Mr. CABANISS. Yes, sir.

Mr. DINGLEY. And it is proposed to amend that bill by a bill granting a pension?

Mr. CABANISS. The bill was referred to the Committee on Pensions and they reported this substitute.

Mr. DINGLEY. That is, as a substitute for a bill to correct the military record of this man they reported a bill granting a pension. That seems to be rather an unusual course, and is hardly parliamentary. I make no objection to the bill itself. I simply call attention to the irregularity.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CABANISS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BIRDS AND ANIMALS IN YELLOWSTONE PARK.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 6442) to protect the birds and animals in Yellowstone National Park and to punish crimes in said park, and for other purposes.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill was read at length, together with the report, on last Friday, and I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the bill now be dispensed with. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. STORER], who had objected, withdraws his objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendments recommended by the committee.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Section 6, line 6, page 3, strike out "State," and insert "district."
Line 8, page 4, strike out "State" and insert "district."

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. COFFEEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk. It has been agreed to by the committee.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of section 5, page 3: "The said United States district court shall appoint a commissioner to enforce the provisions of this act, and the said United States district court shall hold one session of said court annually at the town of Sheridan, in the State of Wyoming, at such date as the said court may order.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LACEY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 6,000 additional copies of the fourth edition of the document entitled "Coinage Laws of the United States, 1792 to 1894," prepared under the direction of the Committee on Finance, United States Senate, with the appendix and an index to the same; of which number 2,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 4,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives.

AMBROSE GISEBURT.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of a bill which has been reported favorably by the Committee of the Whole at a Friday night session.

The bill (H. R. 3309) to pension Ambrose Giseburt was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of Ambrose Giseburt, of Company K, Thirty-third Regiment of enrolled Missouri Militia.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Add to the bill the following:
"At a rate proportionate to the degree of disability from injury to right hip and right shoulder: Provided, Said injury be shown to the satisfaction of the Pension Bureau to have been incurred in an engagement with armed enemies of the United States."

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DOCKERY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

JESSE S. MORRISON.

Mr. FLYNN. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2710) for the relief of Jesse S. Morrison. When an effort was made heretofore to have this bill considered, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] called for the regular order, not understanding that this is a bill which has been favorably reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs, of which he is a member.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a patent in fee simple be issued to Jesse S. Morrison, his heirs and assigns, for the northeast quarter of the southwest quarter and lot 7, section 8, township 12 north, range 7 west, Indian meridian; the south half of the southeast quarter, section 29, township 13 north, range 7 west, Indian meridian; the southeast quarter of the southwest quarter and lot 8, section 8, township 12 north, range 7 west, Indian meridian; and the north half of the southeast quarter, section 29, township 13 north, range 7 west, Indian meridian, Oklahoma Territory, said patent being in lieu of patents issued on March 6, 1893, to "Ben-nank" (or Edward Morrison, and to "Wo-ca-sa-now-ka" (or Nellie Morrison), now deceased, the children of said Jesse S. Morrison and allottees under section 13 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1892, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1891.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In lines 3 and 4 strike out the words "Jesse S. Morrison, his heirs and assigns," and insert "the heirs of Edward Morrison and Nellie Morrison, late of Oklahoma Territory, now deceased."

Mr. SAYERS. On account of the noise I could not catch the purport of the bill as read. I will ask the gentleman from Oklahoma whether the bill is designed merely to perfect the title to a piece of land?

Mr. FLYNN. That is all. The bill has been favorably reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The amendment of the Committee on Public Lands to the title, making it read, "A bill for the relief of the heirs of Edward Morrison and Nellie Morrison, now deceased," was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PROOF IN LAND CASES.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 4605) granting the chief justice of the United States courts in Territories power to appoint commissioners to take proof in land cases, etc.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the chief justice of the court exercising Federal jurisdiction in the Territories shall have power to appoint commissioners in the several judicial districts, to be known when appointed as United States court commissioners.

SEC. 2. That said commissioners shall have power, and it shall be their duty on application by proper person, to receive desert-entry and homestead filings, and also to take evidence in contest cases and final proof, and transmit same to the proper local land office.

SEC. 3. That no commissioner shall be appointed who resides within 30 miles of any local land office, nor shall any commissioner be appointed who resides within 30 miles of any other commissioner.

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect from its passage.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. DINGLEY. I should like to hear some explanation of it.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. This bill has been submitted to the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office. Its sole purpose is to permit the chief justices of Territorial courts exercising Federal jurisdiction, to have the same power that is exercised by Federal courts in the States in the appointment of commissioners to take proof in land cases. It has been decided that these Territorial courts are not Federal courts in the technical sense of the term, and they can not under the general statute appoint these commissioners. It is necessary that power of this kind should be conferred in order that parties may not be obliged to travel hundreds of miles in order to take the proof required at the Land Office.

Mr. DINGLEY. The bill has been unanimously reported?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It has been.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The following amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands was read and agreed to:

In the second section of the bill strike out the words "to receive desert entry and homestead filings, and also to take evidence in contest cases and final proof, and transmit same to the proper local land office," and insert the words "to administer the oaths in preliminary affidavits and final proofs required under the homestead, preemption, timber-culture, and desert-land laws in their respective districts, in like manner as provided for in reference to United States circuit court commissioners, in the act of May 26, 1890. Twenty-sixth Statutes at Large, page 121."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read a third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MCRAE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

NAVAL VETERAN ASSOCIATION, BALTIMORE, MD.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. By direction of the Committee on Military Affairs I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 164) donating cannon to the Naval Veteran Association, Baltimore, Md., be recommitted.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection that order will be made.

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the committees for reports.

The committees were called in their order.

GOVERNMENT PROPERTY, NEWPORT, KY.

Mr. GORMAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the bill (H. R. 2586) granting certain property to the city of Newport, Ky.; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the further consideration of general appropriation bills.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of appropriation bills, and the Clerk will report the unfinished business.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 6016) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask that the Clerk shall read the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNPHY], on which the point of order is pending.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the pending amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 5, line 20, strike out the words "two hundred and forty-three thousand dollars," and in place thereof insert the words "one hundred and sixty-three thousand dollars; and no part of these stamps shall be manufactured, engraved, or printed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing."

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit, for the consideration of the Chair, some remarks in regard to the question of order raised by the chairman of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads on this amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNPHY].

It will be seen on an examination of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York that he has endeavored to bring it within the provisions of the rule by striking out a portion of the sum provided in the text of the bill, and following that reduction with a proposition to the effect that no part of the money appropriated by the bill shall be paid to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for printing and engraving stamps.

I hold that this is not only an evasion of the rule, but that it does not comply with that provision of the rule which would bring the amendment within its spirit and admit it to the bill as being germane.

I need not repeat the provisions of the rule, which are well known to the members. It is to the effect that no proposition in any appropriation bill or amendment proposing new legislation shall be in order unless it be germane to the subject-matter and "shall retrench expenditures." I will not devote any time to the question as to whether this is germane; but desire to call the attention of the Chair exclusively to the fact that this amendment does not upon its face, or according to the rules established by the committee in determining the question, retrench expenditures. I call the attention of the Chair particularly to a decision rendered by the Hon. Michael C. Kerr, Speaker of the House of Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress, on a proposition in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill to transfer the Indian Bureau from the Interior Department to the War Department.

On that proposition a point of order was submitted and the question was reported from the Committee of the Whole to the House. Speaker Kerr, after carefully considering the whole subject, decided that the proposition in the bill was obnoxious to the point of order and ruled it out. That proposition not only abolished the office of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, but it abolished all the offices in the Indian Bureau and transferred the whole Bureau to the War Department. It made no provision, however, for the disposition of the Indian Bureau in the War Department and it required subsequent legislation to make the proposition effective.

On that question the Speaker held:

In the first place, to what considerations, in the making of a ruling, has the Chair a right to look? Can he go outside of this bill and inquire generally, as it is the right and duty of a member upon the floor of this House to do, what will be the effect of this fourth section; or is it his duty to limit his inquiries to the face of the bill, to the specific terms of the section in question, the law of the land so far applicable, and the parliamentary rules and practices of this House? In the judgment of the Chair the range of his investigation is the latter, and he can not properly go beyond these three considerations.

Then he quotes this rule now in force, and which was first adopted in the Forty-fourth Congress when he was Speaker of the House of Representatives. And this decision is, Mr. Chairman, the first interpretation of this rule by a Speaker of the House. It was interpreted at the very session in which the rule was first adopted.

After quoting the rule and after referring to the germaneness of the proposition, he says:

The embarrassment of the Chair arises out of the latter portion of the amended rule, "shall retrench expenditures." Does this section retrench expenditures?

And that is just the proposition I desire to call to the attention of the Chair now, "Does this proposition retrench expenditures?" Speaker Kerr goes on to say:

To answer that inquiry the Chair can only look at the section itself, to the existing law, and to the rules of parliamentary practice and proceedings in this House. The Chair sees that in this bill there is no provision for the practical management of this Bureau of Indian Affairs, if it shall be transferred as proposed by this section; there is no appropriation for that purpose, no regulation of, and no indication how, the duties of that Bureau, after it is transferred, shall be performed, or by whom those duties shall be performed, other than in the somewhat general language of the section itself.

Then he goes on to quote a portion of the section under consideration, and concludes as follows:

It can not be said, therefore, that, if enacted, it will be such an amendment as "shall retrench expenditures" as the mere result of its own enactment in this bill, unaided by future essential and appropriate legislation.

Now, that is just the condition that we find in the proposed amendment. It is simply an amendment to reduce the amount covered by the bill, by the amount indicated by the amendment, and a provision that no part of the money appropriated here for the manufacture of adhesive postage stamps shall be paid to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. If not to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, to whom shall the money be paid, and what amount shall be paid?

We can only go, therefore, to the Departments of the Government to know whether stamps are going to be printed by somebody as a matter of gratuity and without expense to the Government, or whether we must pay somebody else for this work if we do not allow the work to be done by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. There is a provision of the law of the land with reference to this, and therefore this proposition changes existing law. Section 3914 of the Revised Statutes provides:

The Postmaster-General shall prepare postage stamps of suitable denominations, which, when attached to mail matter, shall be evidence of the payment of the postage thereon.

This is all the authority the Postmaster-General has, except in reference to submitting bids asking for proposals for furnishing supplies. Now, the Postmaster-General is required by law to do this work, and under the law he may do it wherever he can get it done the cheapest, and the decision of the Solicitor for the Treasury Department is to the effect that the Bureau of Engraving and Printing can do the work much cheaper than it can be done by private parties.

The honorable gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON], chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, has allowed me to use in this connection, and I shall ask the Clerk to read, a letter addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury by Mr. Reeve, the Solicitor of the Treasury Department, upon the very question as to whether the law as it now exists authorizes the Postmaster-General to have this work done by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and whether the Bureau can do the work cheaper than it can be done elsewhere. And that is the very question involved here. He holds that the law now provides that the Postmaster-General may contract with the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for the doing of the work that he is required by law to have done for the Government, and that he has done that which the law allows. Therefore, to take this power away from him is new legislation, and this new legislation does not provide any other place for doing it, and we are left in the dark as to how much it is to cost us for having it done elsewhere. It must be done somewhere. I now ask the Clerk to read, as a part of my remarks, the letter from the Solicitor of the Treasury Department, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, Washington, D. C., January 31, 1894.

SIR: Referring to my recent opinion relative to the power of the Postmaster-General, with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Treasury, to award to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing the work for furnishing adhesive postage stamps for the use of the Post-Office Department, in which it was assumed that the Bureau had submitted bids in response to the advertisement issued by the Postmaster-General, I am now informed that the Bureau did not submit a bid in response to such advertisement, but subsequent to the date set for the opening of such bids did submit an estimate of the cost of executing the said work, and made a proposition, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, to the Postmaster-General, to execute the work at a cost less than the lowest of said bids for the four years commencing July 1 next.

My opinion is now requested as to whether this condition of facts makes any difference in the conclusion reached by me relative to the legality of having the work executed by said Bureau.

Section 3414 Revised Statutes prescribes that the Postmaster-General shall prepare postage stamps of suitable denominations, which when attached to mail matter shall be evidence of the payment of postage. The act approved March 3, 1893, provides the money necessary to carry into effect the power conveyed by this section and appropriates for the manufacture of adhesive postage stamps and special delivery stamps the sum of $376,200. There is no restriction in these laws upon the Postmaster-General as to how the stamps shall be prepared.

The Postmaster-General advertised for proposals for the execution of this work, expressly reserving in the specifications accompanying the advertisement the right to reject any and all bids if in his judgment the interests of the Government shall require it; and expressly stipulating in case it should be decided by the Secretary of the Treasury to submit bids or estimates for doing the work of furnishing the stamps by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, the Postmaster-General shall have the right to make the award under said bids or estimates to said Bureau if its bid should be found to be lower or more advantageous to the Government than the bids submitted by private bidders, the work to be performed in such event in general conformity with the specifications and under such regulations as might be adopted by the Postmaster-General, with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Treasury.

In response to the adverti sement of the Postmaster-General bids were received as follows:

Charles F. Steele	aggregate..	$146,454.93
American Bank Note Company	do.....	162,401.61
Hamilton Bank Note Company	do.....	179,294.40

Subsequently the Bureau of Engraving and Printing submitted an estimate of the cost and a proposition, approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, to execute the work at an aggregate of $139,487.52.

The bids received under the advertisement being unsatisfactory, the Postmaster-General has not accepted any of them. As to the first named and lowest bidder, Charles F. Steele, it appears that he has no facilities for the execution of such work, and that it is not deemed advisable to risk his ability to procure such facilities in time to make deliveries of stamps by the 1st of July next. Besides, his bid is about $7,000 more than the amount named by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. The next lowest bidder is nearly $16,000 more than the lowest bid, and about $23,000 more than the estimate of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. The third bid is $17,000 greater than the second bid, $33,000 more than the lowest bid, and $40,000 more than the estimate of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

It is estimated that the saving to the Government by awarding the contract to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing would amount during the four years for which the contract is to run, to the handsome sum of $100,000 at least.

The object of advertising under the statute is to invite competition in order that the work of the Government may be done at the lowest price. But, where it is apparent that the work can be done as cheap, or cheaper, by the Government itself, then the reason for advertising no longer exists, and the Government has, in my opinion, an absolute right to do its own work.

For the present purpose, however, my consideration is confined to the facts in this case, and these are: It appearing, after complying with the provisions of section 3709, Revised Statutes, none of the bids made in response thereto being satisfactory to the Postmaster-General, and it subsequently appearing that the Bureau of Engraving and Printing can execute the work at a much lower cost to the United States, I do not hesitate to declare it as my opinion that the contract may be legally made with the said Bureau, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the execution of said work.

Whether in any case the Government has not the inherent power to use its own agencies for the performance of its own work, without inviting competition among private parties, is a question which need not be considered at this time.

As stated in my former opinion with regard to this matter, a great deal of work has been done for the various Departments of the Government by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing without regard to the statute requiring advertisement to be made for all purchases and contracts for supplies or service in any Executive Department of the Government.

By act of March 3, 1875, entitled "An act making appropriation for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and for other purposes," it is provided that the national-bank notes shall be printed under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and that said notes, currency, and other securities of the United States should be executed with not less than three plate printings; and "that the Secretary of the Treasury shall have executed one or two such printings by such responsible and capable and experienced bank-note companies, or bank-note engravers, as may contract for the same, at the lowest cost to the Government, and at prices not greater than those heretofore paid for the same class of work; no company or engraver to execute more than one printing upon the same note or obligation, and the final printing and finishing to be executed in the Treasury Department."

This provision would seem to imply the necessity of advertising for the proposed work, but I understand that this was not done, but that the work was done by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

The act of March 3, 1877, provides, among other things, for the engraving and printing of notes, bonds, and other securities of the United States, "Provided the work be performed at the Treasury Department, and, provided further that it can be done as cheaply and perfectly and safely; and all contracts already made shall be faithfully carried out."

This provision would also imply the necessity of advertising in order to ascertain whether the work could be done as cheaply, etc., at the Treasury Department; but I do not understand that any such advertisement has ever been made.

Therefore, taking into consideration what has been the practice of the Department with regard to work in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, of various kinds, and where advertising would seem to have been contemplated by Congress, and in view of the fact that in the present case the Bureau proposes to print said adhesive stamps for the Postmaster-General at a large saving of money to the Government, I am constrained to hold that in my opinion a legal contract may be made between the Postmaster-General and the Chief of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, with the concurrence of the Secretary of the Treasury, to do this work.

Very respectfully,

F. A. REEVE, Solicitor.

Hon. J. G. CARLISLE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

During the reading of the foregoing,

Mr. SPRINGER said: I suggest that the portion of the letter referring to the various acts of Congress need not be read, but may be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to hear the whole letter. The Clerk will proceed.

The Clerk completed the reading of the letter.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to call attention now, in view of the decision which has been read, to the application of the rule laid down by Speaker Kerr, that there was no provision in the amendment for printing these stamps elsewhere, and, therefore, according to this statement from the Solicitor of the Treasury Department, that it would cost in the four years $100,000 more to print these stamps at private offices than it would cost to print them at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. Therefore the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNPHY] does not retrench expenditures, but increases them, according to the estimates of the Department, at least $100,000 in the four years to be covered by the contract which we would force the Postmaster-General to make with private parties, if we deprive him of the right to use any of this money to pay for this work at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. The amendment, therefore, is new legislation. It deprives the Postmaster-General from doing that which he may now lawfully do, and it does not "retrench expenditures," but actually largely increases them. The point of order is well taken, and the amendment should be ruled out of order.

Mr. BARTLETT. I should like to ask the gentleman one question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to make a statement. The Chair will have no difficulty in applying the rule, if the Chair can secure from gentlemen upon the floor, who desire to speak upon this point of order, the exact legal situation. The Chair will not look to the merits of the amendment in any way in deciding this point of order. What the Chair desires to do is to ascertain from the statute, or from some other source, what the existing law is, and then to determine whether the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York changes that existing law. The Chair hopes that if any other gentleman seeks the floor for the purpose of speaking upon the point of order he will confine himself to that particular point.

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say in the beginning of my remarks that I have no personal interest in this matter; neither have any of my constituents. Any opposition that I may have to the proposal is based upon my repugnance to further extending the field of operations of the Government in the direction indicated. I shall address myself as far as possible to the point of order, but that will involve the proposed practice in this case. It comes before the House in rather a difficult way to be treated as a point of order, for the reason that the bill itself makes no mention of the fact that one Department of the Government proposes to contract with another Department of the Government.

We have that only from outside information. I will call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that this amendment simply provides that the Post-Office Department shall not depart from its previous practice and inaugurate a new one where by one Department of the Government shall proceed to enter into a contract with another Department. I do not think that this has ever before been attempted, or that we have any precedents which will indicate how such a contract can be enforced as in the case of a private firm or individual.

Then I would go a little further, and suppose that this arrangement, because it can not be a contract, is made between the Post-Office Department and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, to whom is the money to be paid? Certainly not to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, as to an outside party. They have no right to accept any such money. To whom shall it be paid? Into the Treasury Department. Then by what authority can the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, without the action of Congress, withdraw that money from the Treasury? That involves a practical question that I am told has never come up before. I also ask, Mr. Chairman, if in the future we desire to have competitive bids, how it can be made fair and equitable as between private parties, who have to guard against possibility of loss, and a bureau of government which in case of miscalculation can call, as is customary, upon Congress to make the loss good by appropriations for deficiencies?

For instance, the Bureau of Engraving and Printing this year calls for deficiencies to the amount of 15 per cent above the appropriations made. In other words, $1,028,000 were appropriated for that Bureau, and they call for a deficiency of $150,255.66. There can be no fair competition between a Department of the Government which has the right, if they make a loss on their contract or arrangement, to call upon the General Government to make that loss good and a private party who has no right to call upon the Government to make good such a loss to him. I make this point of order, after this statement, that it is not limiting the expenses of the Government for postage stamps, that it has contracted for or arranged for with another Department of the Government. It is an impossibility. You can not limit the expenses of the Government in that respect.

Now, look at it as a business proposition, if I may be permitted to speak on that point. There is not a man in this House who does not know that the Government printing, as well as the Government engraving and printing, costs more than such work costs private individuals. How could it be otherwise, when we pay our printers 25 per cent more wages and ask 25 per cent less service? How is it possible that the Government, under such circumstances, can do the work for less than private individuals?

Now, so far as my judgment is concerned, there are certain things that the Government ought to do in the way of engraving and printing for its own security, and there are certain other things it ought not to attempt to do under the unfavorable conditions existing. It is also generally conceded that economy and good government would be secured by limiting the operations of our Printing House to those things necessary for the convenience of Congress, viz, bills, records, and reports, and leaving to general competition the printing of books, etc.

I do not think that any of you will question the statement that the Government would save money, and that there would be less extravagance. We all know that we can get our speeches printed by outside establishments very much cheaper than at the Government Printing Office, where they do it at cost prices. How can it be otherwise under existing conditions of wages and hours of service?

Mr. Chairman, I am not favorable to adding to the work which is already being done such as can be better done outside, providing always that sufficient competition can be secured to prevent the Government from being imposed upon.

I have always supposed that it was good Democratic doctrine to leave to private enterprise everything that can legitimately be left there, and avoid concentration into the hands of Government. Every addition to the functions of any Department is there for all time. It is next to impossible to withdraw it. So we go on, adding one thing after another, complicating the operations of Government, and impeding necessary and proper legislation.

It would seem to me to be wiser to retire from some of the industrial enterprises in which Government has engaged than to venture further in that direction. You will observe, sir, that my objections are not so much directed against the specific proposition as against the principle involved.

Mr. CABANISS. Mr. Chairman, I propose to address myself to the point of order now before the House on the pending amendment, offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNPHY], which reads:

That no part of these stamps shall be manufactured, engraved, or printed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

The section of the Revised Statutes read by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER], and cited by the Postmaster-General in his letter, states that the Postmaster-General "shall prepare postage stamps of suitable denominations, which when attached to mail matter shall be evidence of the payment of the postage thereon."

Now, Mr. Chairman, if this is the only section which refers to the providing of postage stamps by the Postmaster-General, then there is no limitation upon his power.

This is the only one, which I will endeavor to show before I conclude, that does give him power to prepare postage stamps; and there is no limit upon his power in the section cited. Then, if this amendment offered by the gentleman from New York attempts to limit his power, it is a change of law. Does it attempt to limit his power? Clearly. Why? Because it forbids the Bureau of Engraving and Printing from doing that work.

But we are told by another gentleman from New York [Mr. BARTLETT] that section 3709 provides that "all purchases and contracts for supplies or services in any of the Departments of the Government, except for personal services, shall be made by advertising, etc." Now, if postage stamps were technically and generally considered "as supplies," the point made by the gentleman with reference to that section might have some weight as going to show that this amendment was in order. But are postage stamps supplies? In the ordinary acceptation of the term they might be so considered, but legally and technically, as shown by another section of the Revised Statutes to which I shall call attention (section 5413), they are defined to be "obligations or securities of the United States." That section referring to forgery and frauds upon the Government, says:

The words "obligations or other securities" of the United States shall be held to mean all bonds, certificates of indebtedness, national bank currency, coupons, United States notes, Treasury notes, fractional notes, certificates of deposit, bills, checks or drafts for money drawn by or upon authorized officers of the United States, stamps and other representatives of value, of whatever denomination, that have been or may be issued under an act of Congress.

There in that section defining "obligations or other securities" you find "stamps" included.

Mr. VAN VOORHIS of New York. Does that include postal envelopes?

Mr. CABANISS. It does not say so. It says "stamps." It does not say postal cards or postal envelopes, because into those something else enters besides the stamp, namely, the paper which has to be furnished by contract. But the stamp itself is an obligation, a security of the Government, which is redeemed whenever presented, and which passes to some extent as money. It seems singular to me that the matter has never been considered heretofore by the Post-Office Department of entering into a contract with the Bureau of Engraving and Printing for supplying stamps. Stamps are in the similitude of money. They are obligations of the Government, and the same restrictions and protection against forgery ought to be thrown around them that is thrown around money, and nowhere else can that be done as securely and thoroughly as in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing under the Government control.

The point I make, then, is that the power of the Postmaster-General is not limited or restricted by law, and if it is sought to be limited or restricted by the amendment of the gentleman from New York that amendment is new legislation, and is therefore subject to the point of order.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Mr. Chairman, I think the concluding remarks of the gentleman from Georgia settles this question almost entirely. He has quoted the statute under which the Postmaster-General may furnish stamps. Section 3914 provides that the Postmaster-General shall furnish postage stamps of suitable denominations, etc. That is existing law. It is no use for gentlemen who are supporting this amendment to say that it is a proviso with regard to the appropriation, or with regard to the expenditure of the money under the appropriation. It goes further. A proviso of that character may be entirely new legislation, and this does go further.

Take the two amendments, the one offered by the chairman of the committee and the other offered by the gentleman from New York, and the Chair will observe that the first portion of the language of each is the same, but the second portion is this limitation, which is not a limitation on the expenditure of the money, but a limitation as to where and how the Postmaster-General may prepare postage stamps. "And no part of these stamps shall be manufactured, engraved, or printed at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing." We would have had these gentlemen on our side on this point of order if the language had read in this way: "And no part of these stamps shall be manufactured, engraved, or printed at any other place than the Bureau of Engraving and Printing."

I have called the attention of the House to these two amendments for the purpose of showing also that they are divisible; that, virtually, this proposition which I have read is the only amendment that is being considered on the point of order. They can be divided upon a vote and they are divisible as to the point of order. The amendment must first, in itself, make a reduction in expenditures before it can be in order. This amendment is germane I will admit, but it must upon its face show a reduction of expenditures. Does it do so? Not one penny. But suppose these gentlemen were to remodel their amendment and make it $10,000 lower than the reduction proposed by the chairman of the committee, then the question comes up, is that reduction the result of their amendment? Is it in anywise the result of the language upon which we make the point of order? No one will claim that it is. I wish to call the attention of the Chair to a decision which I find on page 268 of the Digest:

To an item appropriating "for free-delivery service $10,450,000," an amendment was submitted striking out that sum and inserting "$10,449,000 to be disbursed in such manner" (the manner prescribed being a new provision of law). It was held that the amendment was germane; that while it changed existing law, it reduced the amount appropriated by the bill, and it was therefore in order. (RECORD, 1, 52, pages 4909,4911.) Upon appeal this decision was, after full debate, sustained by the Committee of the Whole. (RECORD, 1, 52, page 4920.)

It will be noted that the point of order was made against the amendment as a whole. The propositions contained in the amendment were divisible, viz: (1) the substitution of $49,000 for $50,000; and (2) the provision "to be disbursed in such manner," etc. The second branch of the amendment did not of itself result in a reduction of the amount carried by the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I made that point at the beginning.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. The chairman of the committee says that the point was made at the beginning, but I think it is worth repeating and emphasizing.

Again, on page 269, there is another paragraph to which my attention has just been called, and which I will read:

To an item of appropriation for inland transportation of mails by star routes, an amendment was offered requiring the Postmaster-General to provide routes and make contracts in certain cases, with the further provision, "and the amount of appropriation herein for star routes is hereby reduced to $500." A point of order made against the first or legislative part of the amendment was sustained, which decision was, on appeal, affirmed by the committee.

The rule I have stated to the Chair is a familiar one—that the reduction of expenditures must appear as a necessary result in order to bring a provision within the exception of the rule. No gentleman who has discussed this question has claimed that the reduction which this amendment is expected to produce is a necessary result of the proposition. It is true the gentleman from New York but a moment ago went into the question of contracts—to whom the money was to be paid, how a fair competition should be secured, etc. Such considerations do not concern the Chair in deciding the parliamentary question.

There might be another point made; and that is, that this provision is in the form of permanent law. It is virtually the same as if it said—

Hereafter no part of these stamps shall be manufactured, engraved, or printed at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

The omission of the word "hereafter" is not at all significant.

Mr. HAYES. Without that word the provision applies simply to the present appropriation, and does not become a permanent appropriation.

Mr. OUTHWAITE. On page 265 of the Manual I find this statement:

But on examination of the proviso in the bill the Chair finds that it is something more than a limitation upon the appropriation made in this appropriation bill; for it proposes to make a permanent law, the language of the proviso being, etc.

I desire to call the attention of the Chair particularly to the fact that this provision proposes to change a permanent law. The provision of the permanent law has been that the Postmaster-General should prepare these stamps—without any limitation, as the gentleman from Georgia has said, as to how he shall prepare them, where he shall prepare them, or who shall do the work. The present provision proposes to make a limitation on that permanent law.

I do not know anything and do not care anything about the merits of this case. I believe from the statements which have been made that this limitation is calculated to increase the expenditures of the Government. But the essential point is that the proposition does not come within the requirements of the rule, because in order to do so it must necessarily show upon its face a reduction of expenditures.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address the committee for a few minutes on this question of law. Many of the speeches which have been made on the other side have been addressed to the merits, that is, the question of economy has been considered. At the proper time that question may arise; and if it should, I think it can be shown on our side, that is, on the side of those who believe in the amendment offered by my colleague [Mr. DUNPHY], that there can be no certainty, no surety that the Bureau of Engraving and Printing can perform this work as cheaply as it can be done if there be competition in the open market, for two reasons——

Mr. OUTHWAITE. Does the gentleman claim it is incumbent on us to show that, in order to sustain our point of order?

Mr. BARTLETT. Not at all. In making the statement I have just made I except the gallant gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OUTHWAITE]. He has addressed the Chair and the committee strictly with reference to the point of order. But some of the speeches which were made the other day, especially one which attacked the American Bank Note Company, were hardly addressed to the point of order.

The gentleman who spoke a few moments ago, in referring to the remarks which I had the honor to make the other day, comes back to this definition of "obligation or other security of the United States" contained in a penal statute, contained in the statute known as chapter 70, and entitled "Crimes against the operations of the Government."

Now, this revision of the Federal statutes was made in 1873; and this first section—section 5413—seems to have been designed as an introductory section to that chapter—appliable to that chapter alone and to no other part of the Revised Statutes. A careful examination of this section will show that it was designed to have even a more restrictive operation than even that for which I have hitherto contended. It does not refer even to the whole of that chapter. The words are in quotation marks—"obligation or other security of the United States"; and in that order they are found in but one other section of the chapter—that is, in the section which makes it a penal offense to procure or make an impression taken from a tool for making—what? "Any kind or description of"—of what? These words occur in the same order—"obligation or other security of the United States." So section 5413 was designed to refer to section 5432.

Mr. CABANISS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. In one moment. My reason for the assumption I have just made is this: We find in section 5414 the words "Any obligation or security of the United States"—not "obligation or other security," and a different penalty is imposed for counterfeiting an "obligation or security of the United States" from that which is imposed for counterfeiting a postage stamp. Later in the same chapter—and I call the attention of the Chair to this——

Mr. CABINESS. Will the gentleman now yield for a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. I can not be interrupted now.

Mr. CABANISS. It is right on this point.

Mr. BARTLETT. In the same chapter you will find the subheading "Postal crimes," and in section 5464 a penalty is imposed—a fine of not more than $500 or imprisonment of not more than five years, or both—whereas in the earlier part of the chapter the penalty for counterfeiting the notes or securities of the United States—the word "obligation" being used—is $5,000 and imprisonment for not more than fifteen years, a radically different penalty being imposed. So I say it was the intention of the lawgiver to keep these offenses distinct; and this peculiar definition, "obligation or other security of the United States," was meant to cover only this other section (5433)—not the whole of that chapter.

But gentlemen are not content with making it applicable to this whole chapter on crimes, but it is sought to make it applicable to all the securities of the United States—to everything printed for the Treasury Department or any other Department. Now, I say, with all respect for the Solicitor of the Treasury—with all respect for that eminent lawyer who adopts one view on a given day in January, another view five days later, and probably another view in March, for we have three separate and distinct opinions based on different views of the law—I say with all respect for that gentleman that it is not sound law; and no good lawyer in this House familiar with criminal law will say there is any authority for incorporating a provision of a penal statute into acts referring to other matters.

Mr. CABANISS. Before the gentleman takes his seat, will he permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. CABANISS. Does not that section to which the gentleman has referred (section 5413) define what "obligations or other securities" of the United States means? I ask him if that is not the whole extent and purpose of the section—to define what these terms actually mean?

Mr. BARTLETT. I will answer the gentleman——

Mr. BROSIUS. Permit me to ask the gentleman if in his judgment it is to have a general or a special application?

Mr. BARTLETT. The only definitions which have a general application in the Revised Statutes are those which are found at the beginning of the revision. These special definitions found at the head of the various chapters are applicable only to what is within the legitimate purview of the chapter, and can not be extended to anything beyond. Now, although it does not say so in express terms at the beginning of the chapter that it shall apply only to crimes therein considered, every lawyer knows that is the meaning which must be inferred. "These definitions are to apply to the subsequent sections of this chapter, or to such sections of this chapter as may properly be considered to be affected by the definitions."

That is all. These words should be held to be there just as much as if they were actually expressed in the language itself. It is a fair inference in regard to every criminal statute that the definition beginning at the commencement of the chapter, referring to the crimes embodied in the chapter, can not be extended beyond what is legitimately embraced in the chapter itself.

Furthermore, I desire to call the attention of the Chair to what is pretty good Democratic construction upon this subject, and as to the view of what the existing law was on the subject in 1881 and in 1885, on two occasions when the subject matter came up for consideration both in the House and the Senate. I call your attention, Mr. Chairman, to the opinion of Mr. BLACKBURN, now a distinguished Senator from the State of Kentucky, who at that time was a member of the House of Representatives. The question was, as I indicated the other day, the repeal of a provision which by some mistake the enrolling clerk had inserted—a measure permitting the printing to be done by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, which provision crept into the statute of 1879 and was assumed to be the law although it was never formally adopted by either House. In 1881 a proviso was inserted looking to the repeal of the power which the previous act appeared to confer, and Mr. BLACKBURN, then speaking in favor of the rule, used this language——

Mr. SPRINGER. Let me ask the gentleman from what he is reading.

Mr. BARTLETT. From a compilation of the proceedings which took place in the House and Senate. Mr. BLACKBURN said:

> There is no responsible party to insure that the work shall be done at the bid of the Bureau without loss to the Government. I repeat, all that this proviso does is to repeal a provision in the former bill, which provision was never agreed to by either House of Congress.

Why repeal it if it did not affect the law? Why have this discussion in the House of Representatives, and in the Senate, if there were no need of it?

> It crept in by mistake; it has worked so inequitably and unfairly as to shut out all competitive bidding throughout the country, and give the contract to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, provided it would bid lower than existing rates. I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia will not be adopted, and that the proviso in the bill will remain.

It did remain, and that is the proviso that repealed the act which was assumed to have been passed years earlier. And so it still remains.

There was an effort made in 1885 to give permission to the Postmaster-General to reject other bids and without regard to any bid to give the work to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. That proposition failed to pass. Mr. Beck, in objecting to it, used this language:

> It seems there was fair competition and very open competition in regard to all these matters, and it was thought we should not undertake it, especially under the latter clause of the paragraph which provides that the Postmaster-General may reject any or all bids of private parties and award the contracts, or any of them, upon the bid of the Secretary of the Treasury, if, in his judgment, it shall be for the best interests of the Government to do so. That would be giving a power to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the Postmaster-General to increase the employés of this Government almost ad infinitum.

So it was rejected and failed. Now, Mr. Chairman, if the law be as these gentlemen assert to-day, under the provision giving the Postmaster-General the power to prepare postage stamps, why was there ever any need to come to Congress or to come to the House or Senate and ask for the enactment of a law in terms allowing the Bureau of Engraving and Printing to do the work? What a farce, what a waste of time, to ask for supererogatory legislation, to ask for what is unnecessary.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BARTLETT. In one moment.

Mr. SPRINGER. The discretion is left with the Postmaster-General, and that act of Congress referred to in that case simply directed him to have it done at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. BARTLETT. If that be so, Mr. Chairman, if this power to prepare postage stamps can be extended so that it gives the Postmaster-General the power to abrogate all the rules as to competitive bidding, and make a new rule, and have the stamps prepared wheresoever he pleases, and if it can be extended so that he can have this work not done in his own Department, but done by a bureau within a coördinat Department, I say, Mr. Chairman, that it is extraordinary that this power has never been asserted or claimed before, that we have its first assertion anywhere, in January, 1894, and then again in March, 1894.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have the highest regard and esteem for the Secretary of the Treasury and for the Postmaster-General. When I said the other day that they proposed to violate the law, I said it not in any harsh criticism of either of those gentlemen, for I know that neither of them would wish to do anything which he deemed contrary to law. But I assert simply this, that their legal advice is mistaken; that it is the disposition of every executive officer, of every head of a department all over the world, in any government, to assume, just as any court would assume, that it has all the necessary power to do almost anything; and that, starting with that natural tendency, and receiving faulty advice from the Solicitor of the Treasury, they have been led to contemplate this mistake. But it seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that in view of the fact that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] succeeded the other day in having a declaration incorporated into a bill in reference to post-office matters, of more far-reaching magnitude, that it hardly is appropriate for him to object to a declaration of what is existing law in regard to this matter.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HATCH). As the Chair has already indicated to the committee, the only difficulty the Chair encountered in very promptly deciding this point of order has been in ascertaining to what extent the existing law has been construed by competent and proper authority, and what action has been taken by the Department under that construction.

The only provision of law that gentlemen upon the floor have been able to cite to the Chair as bearing directly upon this power of the Postmaster-General, is that contained in section 3914 of the Revised Statutes, which provides that—

> The Postmaster-General shall prepare postage stamps of suitable denominations, which, when attached to mail matter, shall be evidence of the payment of postage thereon.

The only authoritative declaration, in interpretation or construction of this statute, comes from the Department of Justice, and is signed by the Solicitor-General, in a letter addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury. In that he states:

> There is no restriction in these laws upon the Postmaster-General as to how the stamps shall be prepared.

The Clerk will now read the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNPHY].

The Clerk read as follows:

> On page 5, line 20, strike out the words "two hundred and forty-three thousand dollars," and in place thereof insert the words "one hundred and sixty-three thousand dollars: and no part of these stamps shall be manufactured, engraved, or printed by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendment previously offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON], the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, in charge of the bill, an amendment to perfect the text of that section.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amend the paragraph on page 5, line 20, by striking out the words "two hundred and forty-three" and insert the words "one hundred and sixty-three;" so that the paragraph in lines 19 and 20 shall read:
> For manufacture of postage stamps and special delivery stamps, $163,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON] offered this as an amendment to the text of the bill, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNPHY] offered his amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. HUTCHESON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is prepared to rule. The only question for the Chair now to determine is whether the language in that proviso of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNPHY] is in the nature of a direction or control, simply, of the appropriation made, or whether in effect it changes existing law.

In view of the decision of the Department of Justice, to which the Chair has alluded, the letter to the Secretary of the Treasury coming from a coördinate branch of the Government, and one upon which the Secretary of the Treasury or the Postmaster-General had the right to call for such interpretation, and in the absence of any further legislation, or any other interpretation of it, the Chair is compelled to sustain the point of order, and rules that part of the amendment out of order.

Mr. WHEELER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman——
Mr. DUNPHY. Mr. Chairman——
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. DUNPHY] is recognized.
Mr. DUNPHY. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment to offer, which is to be inserted at the same page and line as my last.
The CHAIRMAN. Is it offered as another amendment?
Mr. DUNPHY. It is offered as an amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. As an amendment to the amendment offerred by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. HENDERSON]?
Mr. DUNPHY. As an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina.
The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be used to pay for printing or engraving done by any bureau of the Government.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is the same thing.
Mr. HENDERSON of North Carolina. I make the point of order upon that.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be compelled to sustain the point of order. It is in effect the same. The question now is on the amendment submitted by the gentleman from North Carolina, which the Clerk will again report.
Mr. DUNPHY. Mr. Chairman, there is quite a difference beteen the amendment I offered last and the amendment I offer now. The first amendment provided for a limitation on the use of the money, the other provides for a limitation on the manufacture of stamps.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the effect will be the same and will come within the rule laid down by the Chair in the opinion upon the prior point of order. It restricts, in other words, the authority that the Postmaster-General has under the section of the Revised Statutes, as interpreted by and cited by the Solicitor-General of the United States.
Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a single word upon this question which is being discussed here.
The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the adoption of the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina.
Mr. DINGLEY. I am aware what the question is. The amendment reduces the appropriation for manufacture of postage stamps, with a view of having the Bureau of Engraving and Printing do this printing, on the assumption that by so doing there will be a saving of expenditure. It appears that under the general authority of law, which has been read by the Chairman, the Postmaster-General invited proposals for printing these stamps; that certain private parties made proposals which have been alluded to, being a large reduction from the previous contracts. That after all the propositions had been submitted, the Postmaster-General decided, under the authority which he had, that neither of the proposals was such that the Department could accept.
Thereupon what did the Postmaster-General do? In justice, if not with due regard to law, he should have invited new proposals, even on the assumption that the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was to be one of the bidders. But instead of that, he did not invite new proposals, but allowed the Bureau of Engraving to come in and make a proposal of its own, with knowledge before of what all the private proposals had been and without any competition.
Now, it seems to me, in justice to all the parties and with due regard to the spirit of the law, if the first proposals were not satisfactory to the Postmaster-General, he should have invited new proposals; and if the Bureau of Engraving was to have an opportunity to come in for the purpose of making proposals, he should have given private parties the same privilege.
It appears that the Superintendent of the Bureau of Engraving, with all this knowledge before him, made a proposal of only $7,000 less than the lowest bid of the other parties, which would be a saving of $28,000, on the assumption that the Bureau of Engraving could do printing and engraving of this kind. Now, the assumption that has run through all this discussion is that because the Bureau of Engraving has proposed to do this printing and engraving for the Government for this reduced sum that therefore it will be done for that amount. It will be done for that amount so far as the Post-Office Department is concerned; but who can give us any assurance, founded on reliable estimates, that the Bureau of Engraving will be able to do this printing for any such sum?
There is not a gentleman in this House acquainted practically with this business, as I am somewhat, that does not know that the Bureau of Engraving and the Printing Establishment of this Government can not do its work ascheaply as it can be done by private parties; and why not? Because, in the first place, these bureaus of the Government pay 25 per cent more in wages than are paid by private parties. In the next place, they work 20 per cent less number of hours per day; and in the third place they give a leave of thirty days with pay. Now, there is no one who is acquainted practically with the business who does not understand that the Bureau of Engraving in doing this work will certainly expend more than private individuals would.
There is no doubt that there must be an extension of the plant and enlargement of the buildings of the Bureau of Engraving if this new work is to be done. I have visited that Bureau repeatedly, and I know something about the manner in which the machinery is crowded there while it is doing its present work. So that I say, if the Bureau of Engraving and Printing is to do this work, it must have an appropriation of $25,000 or $30,000 for additions to the building and plant. There is no doubt about that. Then the work must be done at greater cost than it can be done by private parties.
